IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 8, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with section 1665 of the Revised Statutes, a statement showing the expenditure at the Springfield national armory and the arms, components of arms, and appendages fabricated, altered, and repaired thereat during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, reporting that the military reservations of Forts Abercrombie and Seward, Dakota Territory, are no longer needed for military purposes, and recommending that he be authorized by law to relinquish them to the custody and control of the Department of the Interior; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from Major-General Irvin McDowell, United States Army, suggesting a change in the one hundred and fourth article of war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from Robert N. Scott, captain Third United States Artillery, relative to the manner and cost of publishing the Rebellion War Records; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from W. W. Corcoran, chairman of the joint commission for the completion of the Washington Monument, transmitting a resolution adopted by the commission at a meeting held the 21st December, 1878, asking instructions of Congress, and an extract from the proceedings of the Washington National Monument Society at a meeting held on the 13th December, 1878, in reference to the proposed modification in the plan of the monument as prepared by W. W. Story; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present five petitions of sundry citizens of Vermont, and I believe some other States as well, on the subject of arrears of pensions. I move that these petitions lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yesterday a number of joint memorials from the Legislature of the State of Oregon were presented by the Vice-President, and they were not incorporated in the RECORD or read, with one exception, and I believe the reading was dispensed with at my instance at the time. I hold in my hand one, however, of so much importance to the Pacific coast generally that I desire to have it read this morning. It is senate joint resolution No. 1, passed by the Legislative Assembly, tenth regular session, 1878, State of Oregon, and relates to the Chinese question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be reported, as the Chair hears no objection.

The memorial was read, as follows:

To the Honorable Senate of the United States:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that the continued immigration, or rather importation, of cooly slaves or Chinese laborers to this State is a violation of treaty stipulations, which provide that such immigration shall be voluntary, and is a very serious injury to the laboring classes, not only of our State, but of the entire Pacific coast, by the reduction of wages to starvation prices; that such importation of said Chinese and other Asiatic slave labor tends to drive white and all other free labor out of our country, and ultimately compel all who subsist by manual labor to the alternative of choosing between starvation and crime; that at least 75 per cent. of all the earnings of said Chinese or cooly slave labor, instead of being in our midst, and thus contributing to our prosperity, is sent to China, never to return, thus withdrawing the coin from our country and rapidly decreasing our circulating medium, to the great injury of the best interest of this State and of the entire Pacific coast; that such Chinese laborers do not contribute to the wealth and prosperity of the country by the acquisition of property and the payment of taxes, but by pauperism and crime are a continual source of expense to the country and municipalities of this State; that the treaty of 1868 between the United States and China, known as the Burlingame treaty, has never been maintained on the part of China in accordance with its intent and meaning; the right of free migration and immigration which it recognizes was to be entirely voluntary, and to be exercised in view of expatriation. The Chinese have no right to be admitted under the circumstances in which they come here; they are usually brought in hordes in a condition of semi-slavery, and obligated to perform a term of servitude. The privilege, according to contracting parties, was upon condition that the immigration to either country by the citizens or subjects of the other should be a voluntary individual act; China has wholly failed to have that consideration observed, and the United States ought to revoke the privilege; therefore, we, your said memorialists, pray your honorable body to modify the treaty between the United States and the Empire of China so as to stop and prohibit the importation or immigration of Chinese and other Asiatic laborers to this coast.

Adopted by the senate October 12, 1878.

JOHN WHITEAKER,
President of the Senate.

Adopted by the house October 18, 1878.

J. M. THOMPSON,
Speaker of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This is a duplicate.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a certified copy, however.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was yesterday referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of the Oregon Portage Railroad Company, praying an appropriation to aid in constructing a portage railroad around The Dalles of the Columbia River; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of Richard H. Anderson, of South Carolina, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Lansford P. Yandell and others, sureties of H. C. Norvell, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Tennessee, praying to be relieved from liability as such sureties; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALLACE presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, in favor of the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discrimination by common carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Wellington E. Pratt and others, citizens of Roaring Branch, Lycoming County, Pennsylvania, and the petition of John Munday and others, citizens of Pottsville, Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, presented the petition of David S. Davis and over a hundred others, citizens of West Virginia, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of W. H. Luckett, Lewis Cradford, and others, citizens of Maryland, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McMILLAN. On the 18th of December last a convention was held at the city of Saint Paul to take into consideration the improvement of the waters of the great lakes, and the subject of commerce upon the lakes was considered by them. They have prepared for presentation to the Senate of the United States a memorial on the subject, which I have now the honor to submit. It contains very much useful and important information of a general character. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to; and the memorial was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable Senators and Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

The committee appointed by the lake improvement convention, held at Saint Paul, December 18, 1878, composed of delegates from the different trade centers of the country interested in the commerce of the great lakes, present to your honorable bodies this memorial, and beg leave to refer to the following resolutions and extract from the report adopted by the convention:

The most prominent feature of our inland water system is the great lakes which pour, through natural and artificial openings, their waters to the sea. These lakes extend from near the northern boundary of Minnesota, a distance of one thousand four hundred miles, to the Atlantic Ocean, nearly one-half the distance across the continent from ocean to ocean. Between the head of Lake Superior and the Pacific Ocean, a distance of seventeen hundred miles, and inside of the limits that will mainly seek this water outlet—we speak of American territory alone—is a large portion of Minnesota, Wisconsin, all of Oregon, and the Territories of Wyoming, Dakota, Montana, Washington, and Idaho, making an area of over six hundred thousand square miles, and more than three times in extent the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Maryland, and Connecticut. This region of country is capable of sustaining, at the present rate of population in the Eastern States, over twenty millions of people. It may be further and safely said that this vast region, as developed, will, in the production of the cereals, stock, capabilities of sustaining population, wealth of minerals, and salubrious climate, fully equal and favorably compare with any like extent of territory on the American continent. As this region develops and becomes the homes of millions of people, the bulk of its exports will move for distribution to the cities of the East, and via the Atlantic Ocean to the markets of Europe, while its imports must mainly come from the eastern centers and from Europe through the same channels for distribution.

That these limitless productions which will greatly contribute to supply the wants of many millions of people shall be carried from the producer to the consumer at the lowest cost of handling and transportation will not be disputed. That this commerce will find its most direct and cheapest passage through the great lakes is equally plain to all. This important result, however, will not be reached till the people of the country fully realize the deep interest they have in the question and the Government responds with the help required. This work is easily accomplished and at a cost that, commensurate with its importance, is merely nominal. What is imperatively demanded is the right improvement of the harbors, especially the harbor at the head of Lake Superior, and the water-ways, straits, or canals connecting the lakes with each other and with the ocean. This done, unbroken navigation is furnished to full-sized vessels through the lakes, and fourteen hundred miles of water navigation is extended toward and reaching into one of the most fertile sections of the country.

Wheat can then be carried from Duluth or Superior to the eastern cities at less than 6 cents per bushel; flour at 25 cents per barrel; wheat and flour respectively to Liverpool, 18 cents per bushel and 90 cents per barrel, and other tonnage in like proportion. Thus will the consumer and producer receive like benefits from the reduced cost of transportation.

The Northern Pacific Railway has opened to settlement the country west to the Missouri River; a section of the same road is completed at the western end, and six hundred miles of the line is now in operation. Thus, if the lake improvement asked for were completed, more than two-thirds of this great continental highway by rail and water would to-day be open to the profitable uses of commerce, while the extension of the line is steadily progressing to the Pacific Ocean. The Saint Paul and Sioux City, the Sioux City and Saint Paul, the Saint Paul and Duluth, the Saint Paul and Pacific, Minneapolis and Saint Louis, and Saint Paul, Stillwater and Taylor's Falls Railways are now reaching to and traversing the country we are describing, yet, whatever may come by way of business or usefulness to these lines, the benefits to the people from their construction can be but partly realized till they can carry their tonnage to Lake Superior, their natural and cheap outlet to the markets of the world.

The country referred to and tributary to these roads is being rapidly settled by hardy and industrious populations, while its present productions and future promise are awakening the surprise and commanding the admiration of the country.

Emigration from the crowded cities and agricultural sections of the East, as well as from Europe, is moving in to occupy the section we have described with unprecedented rapidity. It is not possible that our Government will much longer permit the few impediments in the lake connections to fatally hinder and obstruct the movement of its present and future production to the markets of the world.

The distance from head of Lake Superior to Montreal via the lakes, the Welland and Saint Lawrence Canals, is twelve hundred and sixty miles, while from Chicago or Duluth to New York via the lakes, Buffalo, Erie Canal, and Hudson River, it is fourteen hundred miles, a distance of one hundred and thirty-nine miles in favor of the Saint Lawrence route. The distance from Montreal to Liverpool via Belle Isle Straits is twenty-seven hundred and ninety miles, and twenty-nine hundred via Cape Race, against three thousand and forty miles from New York to Liverpool. The distance from Chicago to Liverpool via Montreal and Straits of Belle Isle is four thousand and fifty-one miles, and via Montreal and Cape Race forty-two hundred and fifty-nine miles, against forty-four hundred and fifty-nine miles via New York.

The rates of freight from Chicago to Kingston in 1876 were from six to seven and a half cents a bushel, with additional charges of three to three and a half cents for the barge transportation thence to Montreal, an aggregate of nine to eleven cents a bushel, equal to $3 to $3.67 per ton from Chicago to Montreal. The rate in 1877, including freight from Chicago to Kingston and barge charges of three to three and a half cents a bushel from the latter place to Montreal, was $3.62 on wheat and $3.39 a ton on corn, including all expenses.

The reduction in the cost of transportion on the lakes, by the use of a large class of vessels, in place of the small crafts employed in 1845, is much more marked than the reduction on the canals, as the lake vessels of the largest class have fifteen times the capacity of the largest vessels in 1845. The cost now from Chicago to Buffalo per ton on the largest vessels is about half a mill on a ton a mile, or forty-five cents a ton for a distance of nine hundred miles.

The vessels now navigating the lakes and passing through the Canadian canals carry from seventeen to twenty thousand bushels of grain; but on the completion of the enlargement of the canals vessels carrying sixty thousand bushels will load at the head of Lake Superior for Kingston or Montreal direct at about one-third of the present cost by small vessels.

Thus it will be seen that the water-routes, reaching to the East and Europe, are the vehicles furnished by nature to carry to market the productions of the country referred to when they reach the point of transshipment from the land carriage that brings them to the water. When these routes are rightly improved we may safely predict that the policy and interest of the railways in the West will be to carry their tonnage to and not around and away from Lake Superior from three to four hundred miles by expensive lines out of the way to market.

RESOLUTIONS.

Whereas the rapid settlement and fertile character of the vast region of country north and west of the head of Lake Superior, and its inexhaustible mineral and timber resources, call for such improvement of our northern water-way as will give the largest-sized vessels free and uninterrupted navigation through the great lakes, and thus secure to the producer the cheapest and most direct route and to the consumer the products of this region at the smallest cost; and

Whereas the greatest obstruction to this water-way is in the Saint Mary's River, between Lake Superior and Lake Huron, the present condition of which permits vessels of but twelve feet draught to pass; and although the Government has made large expenditures in the construction of a ship-canal for vessels drawing sixteen feet of water, it cannot be available for the purposes designed until such further improvements are made to the river below as will give the required depth of water, and thus save the present loss of 30 per cent. in the carrying capacity of modern lake vessels and the annually recurring loss of so much of the public wealth: Therefore,

Resolved, That we respectfully urge upon Congress the immediate acceptance by the United States of the Saint Mary's Canal, in accordance with the offer of the State of Michigan of April 3, 1869, its establishment as a free canal, and the speedy completion of the new lock and its approaches.

Resolved, That we ask of Congress an appropriation for the further survey of the channels between Lake Superior and Lake Huron, and so much for the improvement of the present channel and the Saint Clair Flats and Detroit River as, in the opinion of the War Department, can be judiciously expended the coming season.

Resolved, That we further petition Congress for an appropriation to complete the survey of the harbor at the head of Lake Superior, and its early improvement, so as to meet the present increasing demands of commerce.

Resolved, That it is of the utmost importance that the necessary harbors on the northern water-way be suitably improved.

Should your honorable bodies grant the prayer of your memorialists, and make such appropriations as will assure the prompt completion of the works demanded, all sections of the country will receive measureless benefits in the guarantees thus given to millions in the East, South, and Middle States for the increase in the necessaries of life at a greatly reduced cost.

Further than this, the opening of this great water-way will enable the producers of the West to place their agricultural productions in foreign markets at such reduced cost as will bring them in direct competition with like products of Russia or any portion of Europe or British India.

Our exports of these productions have already assumed such proportions as to demonstrate that a further reasonable and readily attainable reduction in the cost of transportation from points of production to the ocean will so lower the export cost of breadstuff and meats from the West as to enable this country largely to supply the Old World with food. Reaching this result, we will have secured that balance of trade in our favor, that certain supply of coin, which will aid in sustaining the good credit, progress, and prosperity of the country.

More than 60 per cent. of the population of Great Britain are dependent on foreign food supplies, while her steadily growing population is increasing this dependence. Wise statesmanship now demands that we shall place ourselves in a position to increase our power to supply this deficiency by the expenditure of the small amount demanded to secure such sure and valuable returns. The United States, during the year ending June 20, 1877, exported to England in grain, flour, live sheep, cattle, pigs, dead meat, pork, bacon, and hams, butter, cheese, eggs, and potatoes, amounting in value to $150,000,000.

Returns of British grain imports from the various countries for a period of nine months ending October 31 of the current year show:

From—	Cwts.
Russia	7,432,441
Germany	4,112,184
France	11,004
Turkey, Wallachia, and Moldavia	290,857
Egypt	193,194
United States, on Atlantic	20,963,397
United States, on Pacific	4,208,942
Chili	49,904
British India	1,577,302
Australia	1,309,559
British North America	1,908,244
Other countries	214,925
Total	42,182,102

The quantity received from the United States ports was 25,112,939 cwts. Thus, of the total importations of wheat into the United Kingdom during the six months ended June 30, 1878, nearly 63½ per cent. was from the United States.

American competition in breadstuffs and the cheap grazing lands of this country are telling more upon English farm production from year to year.

The United Kingdom imported of live animals in 1877 about 300,000 cattle, 1,000,000 sheep, from 40,000 to 50,000 swine, and 30,524 horses. Since the 1st of last May and up to the 1st of September, there have been an average of 3,000 cattle a week shipped to Great Britain from Montreal, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. The shipping of live stock and dead meat to Great Britain, now in its infancy, bids fair in a no distant future to assume enormous proportions.

Of the one billion five hundred and ninety-five million dollars' worth of British imports for the year 1876, $795,000,000 were for food; $595,000,000 for raw materials; $205,000,000 for manufactured and miscellaneous articles.

With the improvement of the northern water-way, as urged by the convention, the exportation of products from the West to Europe must rapidly increase and largely contribute to supply the seven hundred and ninety-five million dollars worth of food now annually imported by Great Britain.

The great valley of the Red River is peculiarly adapted to the production of the cereals as well as the raising of stock. It is capable of producing one hundred million bushels of wheat annually, and is destined to become, with contiguous areas, the food-producing region of the American continent, and largely the source of the food supply of the world. The opening and cheapening of the lake route, via Lake Superior to the Atlantic, is speedily to develop this now comparatively unused source of the nation's wealth, as well as to cheapen to millions at home and abroad the necessaries of life.

With the hope that your honorable bodies will grant the reasonable request of your petitioners, they will ever pray.

Mr. KELLOGG presented the petition of George Williams, late private Company C, One hundred and sixteenth Regiment United States Colored Troops, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of George F. Brott, assignee of Brott, Davis & Shons, of New Orleans, Louisiana, praying compensation for certain cotton alleged to have been seized and appropriated by United States military authorities at New Orleans during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a number of petitions, each one of them signed by citizens of the State of New York, praying for the passage of the bill for the payment of arrears of pensions. I move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Walter Davison and others, citizens of Hinsdale, Massachusetts, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOOTH presented resolutions of the constitutional convention of California, in favor of the passage of a law providing for a reduction in the price of public lands within the limits of railroad grants, to enable bona fide settlers thereon to homestead one hundred and sixty acres thereof, and also to restore to pre-emption and homestead all lands within the limits of forfeited railroad grants; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THURMAN. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5067) to divide the western district of Missouri into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it with one amendment and recommend the adoption of the amendment and the passage of the bill as thus amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. THURMAN. I was going to ask the Senate to consider it at this time, as the committee are unanimous, and I believe the House was substantially so, upon the propriety of passing the bill, and I think there can be no doubt about it. It merely provides for dividing the western district of Missouri into two divisions and holding a court in Kansas City, and there is no opposition to it I believe from any quarter.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It creates no new offices.

Mr. THURMAN. There are no new offices required. I ask the Senate to consider the bill at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is very ungracious in me, but I think the amendment had better be printed and go over to be sure that we have not made any mistake in the adjustments of it.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well; I shall not insist upon the consideration of the bill to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am constantly in the habit of making objection to the consideration of a bill when it is reported and therefore I feel at liberty to make this objection to my friend, a member of the same committee of which I am a member.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will take its place on the Calendar.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon; and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. No. 1148) to amend section 619 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 3181) limiting the compensation of clerks of the district and circuit courts when one person holds both offices;

A bill (H. R. No. 3972) fixing the fees of clerks of United States district and circuit courts;

A bill (S. No. 510) to authorize the payment of fees to counsel for the defense of poor persons in the courts of the United States, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5214) providing for a judicial ascertainment of claims against the United States.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1575) granting a pension to Jonathan G. Bigelow; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1576) granting a pension to Chambers C. Mullin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1577) for the relief of Lucinda McGuire; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire without previous notice to introduce a bill, which I do by request of reputable citizens. I know nothing of the merits of the bill, and am not committed for or against it by its introduction.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1578) for the relief of the messengers of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1579) to continue the survey and to make improvements at the bar of the mouth of the Columbia River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1580) to reduce the price of public lands within railroad limits; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1581) for the relief of John M. McClintock; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

SEWERAGE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, presented sundry maps illustrating the various plans heretofore submitted for improving the sewerage of the District of Columbia; and it was Ordered, That 200 copies of the maps be printed and stitched with the plans ordered to be printed by the resolution of the Senate of December 20, 1878.

INSECTS AFFECTING COTTON.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That there be printed 30,000 copies of the special report from the Department of Agriculture on the insects affecting the cotton-plant, with the necessary illustrations, to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing; 15,000 of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 10,000 for the use of the Senate, and 5,000 for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

HAYDEN'S TENTH ANNUAL REPORT.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House concurring,) That there be printed and bound at the Government Printing Office, for the use of the Department of the Interior, 2,000 copies of Professor Hayden's tenth annual report of the Geological and Geographical Survey of the Territories for 1876, uniform with the edition ordered by Congress.

REPORT OF ENTOMOLOGICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed 10,000 copies of the second report of the United States entomological commission; 5,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 1,000 for the use of the commission.

ASSESSMENT OF CHURCH AND SCHOOL PROPERTY.

Mr. WINDOM. I submit the following resolution, to which I am confident there will be no objection, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to inform the Senate what churches, colleges, school-houses, and educational institutions have been subjected to assessment and the payment of taxes for general or special improvements since June 17, 1870; and what sums of money, if any, have been received in respect of general and special taxes assessed on churches, colleges, school-houses, and educational institutions since June 17, 1870; and what taxes, if any, have been remitted or refunded in respect of colleges, school-houses, and educational institutions, the amounts so remitted, and the authority under which such remission and repayments have been made.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PROPOSED JOINT RULE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I rise to offer concurrent resolutions, which I shall ask to have printed, and I think go to the Committee on Rules. I suppose every Senator is aware that we have no joint rules in force between the two Houses at this time, and have not had any for some years. What I wish to accomplish by these resolutions is to declare that on the last three days of this session no bill which shall have passed one House shall be sent to the other for its concurrence, and that on the last day of the session, no bill shall be sent to the President of the United States. These two propositions were embodied in the sixteenth and seventeenth old joint rules of the two Houses. They were adopted as many as fifty or sixty years ago. Even with the small amount of business comparatively which Congress then had, it was found necessary by the gentlemen who had charge of affairs, in order to prevent error and confusion and mistake and mischief, if I may be allowed to use such a word, to have rules of that character; and they were accordingly adopted. They have been the rules ever since until the joint rules fell two or three years ago. Unfortunately, however, in every instance that I remember, when the day came that these most wholesome and beneficent rules were to operate, then they were suspended and did no good. I wish to invite the judgment of the Senate on a report of the Committee on Rules (which is perhaps hardly necessary, but still that is the best way probably) upon the question whether now we are willing at this length of time beforehand, so that it can be done just as well as not, to devote the last three days of the session to bills that are pending between the two Houses on amendments, &c., and the passage of bills that have already passed one House, and the last day of the session to the proper enrollment and comparison of the bills that have passed, and to the proper examination of them by the Chief Magistrate of the United States. With this invitation to Senators to consider the subject, I offer the resolutions and ask that they may be read, printed, and sent to the Committee on Rules.

The resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That no bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent to the other for concurrence after twelve o'clock midnight of the 1st day of March in the present session.

Resolved further, That no bill or resolution that shall have passed the Senate and House of Representatives shall be presented to the President of the United States for his approval after twelve o'clock midnight of the 2d day of March of the present session.

Resolved further, That the foregoing orders shall not be repealed or suspended, except on one day's notice and by a vote of three-fourths of the members of each House present.

INDIAN CHILDREN AT LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate all information furnished by the records or files of the Department respecting an arrangement made between the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Lawrence University of Appleton, Wisconsin, for the education of Indian children, together with copies of such unpaid accounts as have been presented to the Indian Bureau, on behalf of said university, for the instruction of such children; and copies of all correspondence between the Commissioner and the officers of said university, or other persons writing on behalf of said university; and further, that the Secretary be directed to inform the Senate what reason exists for not paying such accounts, and whether the officers of said university have been notified at any time whether such account will or will not be paid.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. THURMAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules are hereby instructed to inquire whether the rules should not be so amended as to admit to the privileges of the floor the ex-cabinet-minister whose appointment was earliest in date of those now living.

I wish to say one word on the resolution to the Senate. I will not disguise the fact that the motive which impels me to offer the resolution is that a gentleman known not only to every member of the Senate, but to almost every American, and to almost every European of letters, who was Secretary of the Navy in Mr. Polk's administration, and is the oldest in appointment of the ex-cabinet-ministers, has not the privilege of this floor. Venerable in years, distinguished by his learning, and also by his patriotism, he cannot come upon this floor to see the workings of that Government whose history he has illustrated in so memorable a manner by his works. I hope that that privilege will be accorded to him. Of course Senators must understand that I refer to Mr. Bancroft.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN]? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GROVER. Mr. President, the following telegram relating to myself appeared in the New York Herald on the thirty-first day of last month, and has been copied into many journals throughout the United States:

UNITED STATES SENATOR GROVER—SERIOUS CHARGES OF FRAUD BROUGHT AGAINST HIM.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, December 30, 1878.

A dispatch received from Portland, Oregon, says:

"For about two months the commission appointed by the Legislature of Oregon has been investigating books and papers connected with the state department. Its report now submitted shows that funds to the amount of $97,000 have either been unaccounted for or paid out without authority of law. Among these amounts are the following items: Swamp-land fund unaccounted for, $27,875; illegal fees paid for conveying convicts and insane persons to places of confinement, $37,382; quartermaster stores in the Modoc war unaccounted for, $13,200; overpaid to Secretary of State Chadwick, $3,600, and to his assistant, T. H. Cann, $1,800; school and school-land funds, about $9,000 deficiency. Since the close of the late State administration T. H. Cann has paid to the Treasurer $5,200 belonging to the various State funds, and declares his ability and willingness to pay all that is due the State from official transactions that came within his supervision. The report is very severe in its condemnation of Ex-Governor Grover. It lays on him a large part of the blame for his loose, extravagant, and corrupt administration. The report is particularly severe in relation to the conduct of the school-land and school-fund commissioners, of which Grover was the head. It charges that the State's educational fund has been squandered until it is not worth fifty cents on the dollar, and it is alleged by the commission that Grover himself took large sums from the fund on very trifling and inadequate security and used money for his own purposes; also that he loaned large sums out of the fund to others in such ways that the money came back to his own pocket, taking for the money, in the name of the State, almost worthless securities, in consequence of which there is a great loss to the fund."

It is a duty which I owe to this honorable body as well as to myself to meet these charges as specifically as they are made, and I will proceed to do it seriatim.

THE TWENTY-SEVEN THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIVE DOLLARS.

This sum was paid out by order of the board of school-land commissioners, of which, as governor, I was president, covering a period of nearly seven years, as expenses in segregating the public lands inuring to the State under various acts of Congress, but chiefly on account of surveying and locating the swamp lands in 1871-'72-'73. The swamp-land grant of 1860 had been left a dead letter for ten years, and the grant was being absorbed and lost. Many of the swamps had been meandered and thrown out of the public surveys of the United States, so that they could not be recognized in the General Land Office and segregated to the State. Not an acre of the university lands nor of the indemnity common-school lands, granted in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections occupied by settlers before survey, had been listed to the State, though these grants were twenty years old. The agricultural-college and salt-springs grants had been lost by neglect.

Specific authority of statute enacted in 1870 required the board to appoint agents in the field, whose duty it should be to employ surveyors and assistants who should actually survey and locate the swamp lands and connect them with the surveys of the United States, so as to be segregated to the State under the grant. The act provided for the sale of these lands at $1 per acre, subject to reclamation by the purchaser, who should on becoming claimant pay 20 per cent. of the purchase money to the board. This 20 per cent. was intended as a fund out of which to defray the expenses of segregation. The rates of pay to agents and surveyors were fixed by the act. The board performed its duty. The agents appointed to execute this work were and are prominent citizens, and responsible both morally and pecuniarily. Their receipts and vouchers, specifically accounting for all the money paid them, with the maps and detailed reports of their work, are on file in the public papers of the State. No member of the board was interested to the amount of one cent in these payments nor in the land surveyed, either directly or indirectly. Many of these surveys have been proven in the United States Surveyor-General's office and adopted by the United States as a part of the public surveys, and thousands of acres of the swamp lands have been segregated to the State by means of this work. And it has not cost the State treasury one dollar. You ask, Where is the wrong? I answer, there is no wrong.

The law was specific and absolute in requiring the work to be done, and it provided the 20 per cent. fund to enable the work to proceed without taxing the people. There never was any other provision made to carry the act into effect. The board ruled that the act carried its own appropriation, and must be executed in a special manner. And from the fund provided they paid the agents, surveyors, chainmen, axmen, and assistants. The State has received the full benefit of this work, as it laid the foundation of securing the entire swamp-land grant, which will probably reach a million of acres. The Legislatures of 1872 and 1874, the former a republican and the latter an independent reform body, to whom these accounts and surveys were reported, appointed special committees to examine the same, and they were passed without any objection of any kind as to the mode of payment, and they were passed without reduction. But this committee, appointed by a Legislature to whom these accounts had never been reported, and to whom under the law they never could be reported, proceeded to re-examine accounts six and seven years old which had already been examined and passed by former Legislatures, and declared the whole sum of these payments "unaccounted for," and for the sole reason, as I learn by a late letter, that this amount was not specifically named in the general appropriation bills; as though a service could not be specially authorized and paid out of the subject-matter of the service without the interposition of the treasury.

It is done every day both in State and National Governments. The quibble of law here raised is a matter of the sheerest technicality. But I will add here, as significant facts, that there was no lawyer on the committee, that this question was not discussed at the time of their appointment, nor was it raised by any member of any former Legislature which had the special duty to receive and pass upon these accounts. This sum was honestly expended for the highest benefit to the State, and honestly and fully accounted for.

THE THIRTY-SEVEN THOUSAND THREE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-TWO DOLLARS.

This sum is stated to be "illegal fees paid for conveying convicts and insane persons to places of confinement." The only knowledge which I have of this subject has been gained from a newspaper recently received from Oregon. The statement is that the committee reported all the mileage paid to sheriffs of the several counties in the State for the past eight years as moneys "unaccounted for." These payments have been made by warrants regularly drawn on the State treasurer out of moneys specifically appropriated for that purpose, and on sworn accounts and vouchers presented by the sheriffs, showing their mileage and services. The provisions of the State statutes on this subject are particular and have been executed according to the letter of the law.

The sheriffs' mileage act was passed in 1864, and has been upon the statute-book ever since. But a subsequent act, providing for a per diem and compensation of certain expenses to sheriffs, was held by the committee to cover all allowances. It appears that the subsequent act does not repeal the mileage act, nor specially conflict with it. The secretary of state, who is auditor of public accounts, on the claim of the sheriffs supported by their sworn statements, ruled that both statutes were in force, and paid the mileage. The secretary's accounts have been biennially laid before the Legislature and approved. I hear no pretense of fraud or collusion. The question raised is a technicality of law, and the sheriffs, if it should be determined that they have received too much, can refund the overpayment. The animus with which this item is scheduled against me will be observed when I state that the constitution of Oregon provides for the election of the secretary of state by the people, makes him auditor of public accounts, requires him to give bond to the State, and to report biennially to the Legislative Assembly, and not to the governor. And there is no provision in that instrument which gives the executive any authority or influence with the secretary of state. The secretary is an independent officer, and is authorized to give advice to the Legislature on fiscal affairs. Whether right or wrong in this matter, I never was consulted in the premises by the secretary, and have had nothing whatever to do with it. I never heard in Oregon that there was a question about the sheriffs' mileage.

THE THIRTEEN THOUSAND TWO HUNDRED DOLLARS.

This sum is stated as "quartermaster stores in the Modoc war unaccounted for." That this statement is false, and false without excuse, I will proceed to demonstrate. In the nature of the service no large quantity of quartermaster stores could accumulate or be disposed of, so as to remain unaccounted for. For no stores were purchased except on requisition for immediate use, and when delivered were receipted for, and an account was required of their expenditure or return. To show that all this property was accounted for, I will produce a record which cannot be gainsaid. I refer to the report of the late Inspector-General James A. Hardie, of the United States Army, now deceased.

The Modoc hostilities occurred in 1872 and 1873.

By order of the Secretary of War, under act of Congress approved June 8, 1874, General Hardie was directed to proceed to Oregon to examine and report upon this very Modoc service. He promptly proceeded and executed the duty. His report is contained in House of Representatives Executive Document No. 45, Forty-third Congress, second session, and touching the exact subject of this charge reads as follows:

Having finished the investigation with which I have been charged, I report in the premises as follows:

Immediately upon the receipt of my orders, I proceeded to Oregon and California. Arriving at Salem, in Oregon, I called upon Governor GROVER, who promptly and cheerfully put the records of his office at my disposition, and furnished me every other facility for my investigation. The secretary of state, the adjutant-general, the governor's secretary, the commanding and staff officers of the troops, and other State officials, all rendered me every assistance in their power. The assistant adjutant-general of the Department of Columbia, Major H. Clay Wood, also afforded me important aid.

I visited the different places in the States named, where the more important purchases were made and expenses were incurred. I examined all persons that I could reach connected in any way with the accounts in question, generally under oath requiring in most cases sworn statements of the correctness of their accounts as presented to the State. I ascertained the nature of the transactions of the administrative officers connected with the expedition, and every other important fact, it is believed, relating to the acquisition and disposition of the property concerned; the raising, service, and disbandment of the troops.

Having been at the lava beds during the Modoc operations last year, and having traveled over most of the routes used by the troops, I was in a position to become readily acquainted, through a second visit, with the leading features of the region in which the expenditures originated, and, besides, to become well acquainted with men and things concerned.

Thus prepared for an intelligent study of these accounts, laborious care has been expended in their examination, with a view to a report thereon satisfactory to the War Department, and furnishing a safe basis of action thereupon by Congress.

On page 3 of this report I read:

On the 24th of March, 1874, General Schofield forwarded to the War Department a communication from Governor La Fayette Grover, of Oregon, dated February 13, 1874, being a full report of the history of the Modoc troubles, of the connection of the State authorities with the military operations resorted to for the suppression of the Modoc disturbances and for the protection of the frontier, and embodying also abstracts of expenditures involved, returns of property, rolls of troops and citizens employed, and giving, in short, a full and explicit account of every branch of the subject in hand, from his own point of view. General Schofield's action was had in obedience to a call from the War Department for information upon the topics in question, anticipatory of the investigation subsequently directed by Congress.

Again, on page 5:

The purchases of quartermaster and subsistence property were made principally in Roseburgh, Jacksonville, and Portland. The purchasing officers were (for supplies pertaining to the quartermaster's department) Quartermaster-General Jesse N. Barker and Major W. A. Owen. Major Quincy A. Brooks had principal charge of books and accounts.

The subsistence supplies were purchased under the direction of Colonel J. N. T. Miller. Returns were carefully made, at the close of the second service, of all the transactions pertaining to the quartermaster and subsistence departments; copies of them accompany this report.

Again, on page 7:

For all issues of stores of any kind consumed by the troops, or used by them in service, except clothing, requisitions and receipts were prepared at the time of final adjustment covering all the transactions of the whole period. These papers were presented to the company officers and others concerned for their signatures, and form the vouchers by which the quartermasters and commissaries acquitted themselves of their responsibility to the State for the property acquired by them. These returns are prepared in similar shape to that in use in the Army.

The clothing referred to as excepted out of the vouchers was charged to the men on the rolls and formed part of their pay. After a most thorough and critical examination the Inspector-General did not reject a single claim, and but a few were suspended. On page 12 he says: "The claims actually suspended for want of proof amount to $2,369.75."

In fact, the volunteer service of Oregon in the Modoc hostilities of 1872-'73, and the integrity of its management, were so well considered by the people of that State that the Legislature of 1874, the controlling majority of which was elected on an independent platform of "retrenchment and reform," after a searching examination of its accounts by a special committee, aided by skilled assistants, approved the same, and assumed and paid the expenses of the entire service. A bill is now pending before this body for the reimbursement of the State.

So that the integrity of these Modoc war accounts have been twice established by commanding authority, once by the Legislature of Oregon and once by the Inspector-General of the United States Army, approved by the Secretary of War, acting by authority of Congress.

The Inspector-General cut down the rates of pay allowed by the State to volunteers, and their horses and transportation, &c., but his action in no way affected the integrity of the accounts. This charge against me therefore vanishes.

THE THIRTY-SIX HUNDRED DOLLARS AND THE EIGHTEEN HUNDRED DOLLARS.

As to these sums, stated as "overpaid" to the secretary of state and his assistant, I know nothing except that I have heard that they were paid under specific appropriation for that purpose, and attacked by the committee on technical grounds. But in no manner do they affect me, as I had no more authority, as executive, over this subject than the President of the United States has over the employment and pay of clerks in this body.

THE NINE THOUSAND DOLLARS

is stated to be a "deficiency" in school-funds in the hands of Thomas H. Cann, who was clerk of the board of school-land commissioners. His accounts were all duly settled before the Legislature every two years while I was governor, and found correct. He writes me that his accounts are correct now.

THE SCHOOL FUNDS.

The school funds of Oregon are in the hands of the State treasurer and of the several county treasurers, and are under the general supervision of the board of school-land commissioners. Those officers negotiate the public loans with as much care and under as strict provisions of law as real-estate loans are made in any other State, and there has been no greater depression of real-estate values in that State than in any other. It is the merest demagogism to attempt to cast upon any set of public officers in any State the fault of depreciated securities which rest mainly for their support upon the general prosperity. Yet the statement that school-mortgage securities in Oregon are not worth fifty cents on the dollar is grossly and utterly untrue.

I have myself had one of these loans, but it was based on the soundest security, and has been fully repaid, with interest. I have been interested in two other loans of this kind as a stockholder in corporations connected with them, but all the loans which I had any connection with were duly made and fully secured according to law, and were duly reported to the Legislature of 1876, which elected me a member of this body. Had there been anything wrong in any of these matters I could not have been elected.

Mr. President, this committee, though composed of persons of known hostility to myself, are not chiefly responsible for this report. They were selected as persons capable of being manipulated by men who for years have been my personal enemies; who, having failed to defeat me in open field and fair contest, seek now my destruction by discharging this missile of their venom from secure ambush in the distance. But their work is overstrained and it will fail.

The State of Oregon, sir, is in as good financial and economic condition as any State in the Union, and in far better condition than a great majority of States.

Its current expenses are paid by a tax of four mills on the dollar of taxable property. It has no bonded debt of any kind, either State, county, or city, while its outstanding warrants on the treasury do not exceed $200,000, with $100,000 usually carried in the treasury as a margin on various accounts. This treasury statement is not exact, but it is approximate. The State is virtually out of debt, except limited liabilities which were contracted to be paid out of internal-improvement and swamp-land sales, which are in course of liquidation in that way.

The State capital and penitentiary are erected. These buildings are of ample size and permanent and enduring structure. We have schools and churches everywhere. The people are vigorous, industrious, enterprising, frugal, and happy, and they look forward to a pleasing and flattering future of a great State, and I repel this slander upon them and me.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Five minutes remain of the morning hour.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The bill reported from the joint committee on the reorganization of the Army was made the special order for this day, and I now move to take it up.

Mr. MITCHELL. I appeal to the Senator from Rhode Island, and in that connection state that on the last day of the session before the holidays I gave notice that I desired to call up yesterday a certain bill simply for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon it. I gave way yesterday to certain Senators who desired to speak on other matters, and I should like to have the privilege this morning of being heard. I simply wish to have the bill taken up in order to submit some remarks upon it, and it will not interfere with the consideration of the Senator's bill to-day.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If the bill of which I have charge can be taken up to-day of course I am quite willing to yield to the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Such an arrangement must be made with the assent of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WADLEIGH,] the unfinished business being the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, on which the Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I feel compelled to ask the body to consider Senate bill No. 300, for certain reasons which will be satisfactory to my friend the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I shall consent to yield precedence to that bill if the bill which was made the special order for to-day can then be taken up.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I should be glad to yield to the Senator from Rhode Island as a matter of courtesy; but for reasons which I can state to him at another time it is impossible for me to do so now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, and the unfinished business of the Senate is the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, on which the Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I cannot, for certain reasons.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE HARTRIDGE.

GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar of the Senate and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to transmit to the Senate a copy of resolutions passed by the House upon the announcement in that body of the death of Hon. JULIAN HARTRIDGE, late a Representative from the State of Georgia. The House of Representatives have passed a concurrent resolution providing for the appointment of a special joint committee of seven Members and three Senators to take order for superintending the funeral and to escort the remains of the deceased to his late residence in Georgia, and the Speaker has appointed as such committee on the part of the House Mr. PHILIP COOK, of Georgia; Mr. SAMUEL S. COX, of New York; Mr. G. C. CABELL, of Virginia; Mr. JOSEPH C. STONE, of Iowa; Mr. R. H. M. DAVIDSON, of Florida; Mr. JOHN HANNA, of Indiana, and Mr. J. I. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I ask that the House resolutions be laid before the Senate and read.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 8, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, offered the following prayer:

O Lord our heavenly Father: From everlasting to everlasting thou art God. We are the creatures of a day; and as the flower of the field we are passing away. All our blessings come from Thee; and we recognize Thy hand in all Thy gifts. In Thy providence, mysterious to us, it has pleased Thee to call from our midst still another member of this House of Representatives. O God, teach us the brevity of our life. Impress us with the solemn duties of the present hour that we owe to Thee. And grant, O Divine Spirit, that whilst in submission we bow to Thy will we may be taught by this afflicting providence so to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.

Almighty God, bless the Presiding Officer and all the members of this House. Guide them in public and private duty, that fidelity to every trust may distinguish and characterize every member. Upon the Government, in all its departments, and upon the people of our land we implore the Divine blessing, in the name of Jesus Christ our Redeemer. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of Mrs. Eliza Livingston, widow of Dr. Joseph W. Livingston, deceased, praying such redress as may be deemed proper by Congress for the arbitrary arrest and imprisonment of her late husband at Leon, Nicaragua, by an armed force, by order of the government of Nicaragua, and asking that the papers on file in the United States legation at Guatemala and the Department of State, Washington, relative to the matter, be sent for; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MATTHEWS presented the petition of Smith Rattingale and others, citizens of Wheelersburgh, Scioto County, Ohio, praying for the prompt passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I also present a petition on the same subject from the executive committee of the Pensioners' Association, signed by John C. S. Burger, W. L. Trembly, Horace H. Brower, George Sadler, M. D., and F. H. Knight. As the petition is quite brief and presents some statistics in reference to the number of persons to be benefited by the passage of the bill and the amount probably necessary for that purpose, and in conformity with the request of these gentlemen who represent the great body of the pensioners throughout the country, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it may be read at the Clerk's desk and incorporated in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported at length.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table, and was read, as follows:

PENSIONERS' MEMORIAL.

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

Your memorialists respectfully represent that the House of Representatives by exceeding unanimity has recognized the unconstitutionality of the pension limitation law in its application to those who entered the service before it was created a statute, while the equity of the arrears of pension bill has never been questioned.

No measure since the war has been passed by our National Legislature so fraught with extreme interest to a suffering class as the bill referred to, and which would mitigate an immense amount of human suffering and be the means of prolonging many precious lives.

Your memorialists respectfully refer to the fact that six State Legislatures have almost unanimously recommended the passage of the bill, while numerous organizations have made similar recommendations, and petitions of over two hundred thousand citizens to the same effect have been filed in Congress.

Your memorialists also feel it a duty to present a careful detailed statement made by the Pension Office on call by the House Committee on Invalid Pensions embracing the number interested and the amount it would require to meet the provisions of the bill up to January 1, 1876.

The following statement was duly rendered:

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT, PENSION OFFICE, March 8, 1876.

But the chairman of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions properly deducts one-third from the estimated amount on account of deaths, suspensions, &c., leaving the sum of near $9,000,000 as the total amount due to January 1, 1876, and at the same increased ratio up to the present time the amount would not exceed over fifteen millions required to pay this just debt, which should have a preference of consideration over all obligations which have ever been assumed by Government.

In behalf of honesty, equity, justice, and morality, and in upholding and maintaining the national faith which has been pledged to the payment of this just debt, we pray your honorable body for a prompt passage of House bill No. 4234, which requires only your sanction in answer to our prayers to become a law.

Respectfully submitted in behalf of afflicted pensioners,

W. L. TREMBLY,

BURR S. CRAFT.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1287. Twelve years ago Mr. Craft, for whose relief this bill is reported, lost a coin certificate. The purpose of the bill is to authorize the issue of another one. The interest——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported by its title and objections asked for.

The Secretary read the bill (S. No. 1287) for the relief of Burr S. Craft, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Burr S. Craft $5,000 in gold coin of the United States, in lieu of certificate of deposit numbered 25378, issued under act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, by the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, on the 14th of November, 1866, for the sum of $5,000, payable in the gold coin of the United States, to the order of E. H. Birdsall, and by him indorsed, payable to the order of Burr S. Craft; which certificate, it is claimed, was lost or stolen on or about the 18th of December, 1873. Before the payment authorized Craft is first to file in the Treasury a bond in a penal sum equal to the amount of the missing certificate, with sufficient sureties, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim because of the lost or missing certificate; which bond shall be executed in the same manner and form as required under section 3705 of the Revised Statutes for the issue of duplicate registered interest-bearing bonds of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

Mr. HILL. I should like to hear something about that case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HEREFORD on the 18th of December, 1878:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1287) for the relief of Burr S. Craft, report as follows:

That on November 14, 1866, a gold certificate for $5,000 was issued by the assistant treasurer of the United States at the city of New York, payable to the order of E. H. Birdsall. In reply to a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, he says:

"At that time Birdsall was a clerk in the office of the assistant treasurer at New York, to whom the certificates were really made payable before issue, and whose duty it was to indorse each certificate in blank before paying it over the counter.

"It was then and still is customary for holders of these certificates to render them payable to order by placing an indorsement over the clerk's name, and it is not unlikely that the certificate in question, which is still outstanding and unpaid, was in that manner made payable to the order of Burr S. Craft."

Said Craft, on March 7, 1867, had this and seven other certificates, and deposited them for safe-keeping with the assistant treasurer at the city of New York, as shown by testimony of Henry C. Smith, teller in the City National Bank of Poughkeepsie.

That afterward, namely, March 29, 1869, this certificate and eleven others of like amount were in the possession of said Craft, and by him on said day withdrawn from the Chemical National Bank of New York, as shown by the testimony of George G. Williams, cashier of said bank.

On the 9th day of January, 1869, said certificates were in the possession of said Craft. On the 18th day of December, 1873, said certificate No. 25378 and two others were stolen from said Craft. Said certificate had been made payable to order of said Craft in the manner set out in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury before referred to. Your committee further report that said certificate is still unpaid and has not been presented for payment; that the other two which were stolen from said Craft have been by him recovered and paid, and that said certificate No. 25378 is the only one unpaid.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill as amended, namely, in line 18, after the word "to," insert the word "double," so as to make the bond double the amount of the missing certificate.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims, with an amendment, in line 18, after the words "equal to," to insert the word "double;" so as to read:

That before the payment hereinbefore authorized the said Burr S. Craft shall first file in the Treasury a bond in a penal sum equal to double the amount of the said missing certificate, with sufficient sureties, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. EDMUNDS and others. Oh, no.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WINDOM. If a word is in order, I should like to say that an appropriation bill——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Debate is not in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Debate is not in order unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. WINDOM. Then I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS and others. No, no.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a bad practice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is not granted. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 13, noes 27.

COIN FOR DUTIES AND INTEREST.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to call up the resolution which I offered a day or two ago, and of which I gave notice, in order that I may make a few remarks in regard to it this morning and let final action be had upon it. I move to take up the resolution for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BECK January 7:

Resolved, That the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, being Executive Document No. 8 of the present session, in answer to the resolution of the Senate passed December 3, 1878, relative to the amount of silver coin received in payment of customs dues during the current fiscal year and the disposition which has been made of it, be referred to the Committee on Finance, and said committee is authorized and directed to make such investigations as it may deem necessary to ascertain whether the laws relative to the payment of customs dues, and the payment of interest on the public debt with the coin received therefrom, have been and are being complied with, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, desiring to be as brief as possible, I shall, unless the Senate orders otherwise, ask the Reporter, without reading it in detail, to insert in the RECORD Executive Document No. 8, being the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury to the resolution I had the honor to offer, which the Senate passed December 3, 1878. It is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 16, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution dated December 3, 1878, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what amount and denomination of silver coin has been received in payment of customs dues since the beginning of the current fiscal year, and whether or not he has applied the silver coin so received in whole or in part to the payment of the interest on the bonds or notes of the United States. If it has not been so applied, to state the reason why; if it has been applied to that purpose in part only, to state what portion has been so used, and on what character of obligations. He is directed to inform the Senate the amount of interest he has paid on the bonds and notes of the United States since the current fiscal year began, and the amount of such interest which he has paid in gold and silver coin respectively."

And in reply to inclose herewith copy of report, dated 9th instant, from the Treasurer of the United States, to whom the resolution had been referred, which gives the information called for.

Under existing law either gold coin or standard silver dollars may be used in payment of the interest of the public debt. The law does not direct which shall be paid, but leaves this to the discretion of the Department, to be exercised upon considerations of public policy; and the practice, as stated by the Treasurer, of allowing the public creditor the option of the form and denomination of money in which he shall be paid has thus far been observed.

The manifest object of the act to authorize the coinage of the silver dollar and restore its legal-tender character, when construed in connection with the resumption act, is that gold coins and the standard silver dollar shall be maintained at par with each other, and this object can best be attained by paying out such coin as may subserve the convenience of the person to be paid, and not to force upon him either form of money.

Any other course would discriminate against the standard silver dollar and tend to its depreciation.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. WM. A. WHEELER,
President United States Senate.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, December 9, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith, in compliance with your request, Senate resolution of the 3d instant, referred to this office by you under date of the 4th instant for information. The scope of the resolution seems to be comprehended in the following inquiries:

First. What are the amount and denomination of silver coins received in payment of customs dues since July 1, 1878?

Second. Whether the silver coins so received have been applied to the payment of interest on the bonds or notes of the United States; and, if not, the reason why?

Third. What amount of coin interest has been paid since the above date in gold and silver coins, respectively?

In answer to the first inquiry, it may be said that no distinction has ever been made between gold and silver money in the Treasurer's general account coin, to which account all coin receipts of the Government are carried by warrant of the Secretary of the Treasury, under section 305 Revised Statutes; no record is kept of the denominations of either the gold or silver coins received for customs, and no information can be given from the records of this office showing what amount of the general receipts from customs for the current fiscal year was in silver coins; the receipts of subsidiary silver on account of customs are necessarily small, for the reason that such coins are not receivable except for fractions of a dollar, when the payment to be made exceeds $5. The total receipts of standard silver dollars at this office and at the subtreasury offices, for the period from July 1, 1878, to November 30, 1878, were $5,178,345, from all sources except coinage, including customs, the 4 per cent. loan, and silver certificates; deducting from this sum receipts of silver dollars from other sources than customs, and $1,500,000 is a very liberal estimate of the amount of silver dollars received on account of customs for the period above mentioned.

The above figures do not, however, cover silver certificates received on account of customs, principally at the New York office, which amounted during the current fiscal year to $11,260,000. This amount exceeds the total of silver certificates issued, which is accounted for by the fact that when received for public dues silver certificates have been again paid out. The greater portion of the above $11,260,000 is represented by only $6,717,000 in San Francisco silver certificates received for customs in New York, all or a portion being again paid out by that office and again received for customs. Silver certificates cannot be paid for interest, their issue being authorized only upon the deposit of standard silver dollars.

In response to the second inquiry contained in the Senate resolution, it may be stated that the silver coins received during the current fiscal year have not been specifically applied to the payment of interest upon bonds and notes of the United States, except so far as the fractional silver so received has been used in disbursements for coin interest in making payments of fractional parts of a dollar. No instructions have been given by the Department directing the payment of interest upon bonds and notes of the United States in silver. In making coin payments, however, payees are permitted to elect which currency they shall receive, whether gold, silver, coin certificates, or United States notes. The Treasury has also exchanged standard silver dollars with the public for gold coin, to the amount of $1,534,785. The receipts of silver coin for customs duties during the current fiscal year have not been sufficient to enable the Department to make payment exclusively in silver coin. No general demand for it, in lieu of gold, was manifested by those entitled to coin interest from the Government. While reserving the legal option of the Government to pay either gold or silver coin, it has been the general practice to comply with the request of the holder of a demand against the United States as to the form or denomination of money desired by him, and this practice has been observed in the payment of interest of the public debt.

In the disposition of the coin paid for duties on imported goods, though the requirements of section 3694 Revised Statutes have not been disregarded in respect to the application of coin so received, first, to the payment of coin interest; second, to the sinking fund; third, to the payment of the residue into the Treasury, attention is directed to the fact that nearly the entire receipts of standard silver dollars from all sources, including coinage, have been expended in the purchase of silver bullion under the appropriation made in the first section of the act of February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character."

To the third inquiry it is replied, that the coin interest paid during the current fiscal year amounts to $39,345,224.37, and no fuller information can be given than that contained in the reply to the second inquiry as to the amount of such interest which was paid in gold and silver coin respectively.

Very respectfully,

JAS. GILFILLAN,
Treasurer United States.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, I think it probable that I would have allowed the Senate to refer the communication of the Secretary to the Committee on Finance when it was received, without saying a word, but for a very remarkable statement which the chairman of that committee [Mr. MORRILL] saw fit to make on the 16th of December last in reply to my explanation of the reasons why I desired a prompt answer to the resolution passed by the Senate on the 3d day of December. He said, as the RECORD shows:

Mr. President, I rose merely to say that if the Senator desired to make his explanation, I had no objection to that; but I do object to the consideration of the resolution to-day. I have no doubt of the purpose of the Senator from Kentucky, and that purpose, I think, is to embarrass resumption.

The Senator has a right to his opinions, but he has no right to attribute motives to me other than what the resolution I offered or the reasons I assigned indicated. I opposed and voted against the resumption act in 1875, as unwise and impolitic when such enormous debts, Federal, State, municipal, corporate, and individual, oppressed the people; when all industries were prostrated and labor sought employment in vain. It has been reached by the ruin of hundreds of thousands of the best men in the country, by the destruction of values amounting to confiscation of one-third at least of the property of the people in the interest of the bondholders and money-changers. All that I am now seeking to do is to require the Secretary, as the law requires him, to use the silver coin as he uses gold coin, and to prohibit him from further increasing the bonded debt of the country.

I do not propose to anticipate the report of the Committee on Finance in regard to the answer which the Secretary of the Treasury has seen fit to make to the resolution of December 3, 1878, further than to express the opinion that he has evaded the plain, direct questions put to him, in a manner wholly unbecoming a high public officer when responding to a resolution of this body. He knows, and should have said frankly, that he has not paid a dollar of the silver coin received from customs on the interest on the public debt, and the pretense that he allows the public creditor to say in all cases what character and denomination of coin he would like to have, because any other course would be a discrimination against and might tend to depreciate the silver dollar, will not be believed by intelligent men anywhere, while the claim that silver certificates received on account of customs, as the Secretary says they have been, to the amount of over $11,000,000 since July, 1878, are anything but symbols and evidences that the coin they represent is in the hands of the Government and subject to its control, is simply absurd. The act of February 28, 1878, which makes silver dollars a legal tender for all demands public and private, by the third section thereof authorizes any holder of not less than ten dollars to deposit it with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States and receive a certificate, upon the presentation of which the holder is entitled to the amount of coin deposited, and custom-house officers are ordered to receive these certificates precisely as they would coin, the amount they represent being already in the Treasury. The customs dues are paid in coin, not in certificates; these merely attest the fact that the coin is in the Treasury, and it becomes the property of the United States, being paid for customs dues precisely as if it was counted dollar by dollar into the hands of the revenue collector, who is charged with that amount of money as soon as the transaction is closed. The merchant who pays, say $1,000, to pass his goods through the custom-house, may pay it in one hundred certificates of $10 each, which he may have obtained from one hundred different people: the coin they represent becomes the absolute property of the United States, and is at once subject to the uses to which coin received for customs dues is by law appropriated, and cannot be otherwise legally used. Yet, in the face of these facts, the Secretary adopts and sends to the Senate as his answer the following nonsense signed by the Treasurer. After stating that $1,500,000 would be a liberal estimate of the coin actually paid at the custom-houses since July, 1878, he says:

> The above figures do not, however, cover silver certificates received on account of customs, principally at the New York office, which amounted during the current fiscal year to $11,260,000. This amount exceeds the total of silver certificates issued, which is accounted for by the fact that when received for public dues silver certificates have been again paid out; the greater portion of the above $11,260,000 is represented by only $6,717,000, in San Francisco silver certificates received for customs in New York, all, or a portion, being again paid out by that office and again received for customs. Silver certificates cannot be paid for interest, their issue being authorized only upon the deposit of standard silver dollars.

There is as much absurdity in that paragraph as could be well crowded into as many words. He says "silver certificates cannot be paid for interest." Admit it; they are not a legal tender to any private person for anything, but the $11,260,000 in silver coin which these certificates showed had become the absolute property of the United States, and already deposited in the Treasury, not only could be paid for interest, but was by law and specific permanent appropriation set apart and dedicated first of all to be applied for that purpose, and is a legal tender for all purposes. Again he says, and that is true, "These certificates could only be issued upon the deposit (in the Treasury) of standard silver dollars." Yet he says the $11,260,000 "exceeds the total of silver certificates issued" by nearly $5,000,000. I hope the Finance Committee will cause careful inquiry to be made, and advise the Senate by what authority and under what law that state of things is brought about. The Treasurer says the silver certificates received for customs in New York are again "paid out by that office and again received for customs." How they are paid out except on the deposit of an equal amount of silver coin, and how $11,260,000 of them have reached the custom-house unless that amount of coin has reached the Treasury, is something the Senate ought to know.

But I will not at present criticise further the very remarkable answer we have received from the Treasury Department upon that point. I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that the true intent and meaning of the provisions of the act of February 28, 1878, authorizing silver certificates to be received for customs dues, was to place them precisely on the same footing on which gold certificates are placed by sections 254, 3009, 3473, and 3474 of the Revised Statutes. No certificate was ever made a legal tender which the creditor of the Government is bound to accept. He may accept it, but his bond calls for payment of interest in gold or silver coin of the standard value on July 14, 1870, and nothing else will, without his consent, discharge the obligation to so pay the interest. All the evasions of the Treasurer as to the silver certificates not being legal tenders for interest show, as was said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] on a memorable occasion, "scant respect for the Senate and none for the law." The position taken by the Secretary that the public creditor should be allowed to determine what character of coin he prefers to be paid in when the United States have the right to pay in either, cannot be maintained. The Secretary is the trustee and agent of the people, not of the creditor. The option is for the benefit of the people, and the right is absolute in their agent to pay silver coin without consulting the creditor, if the interest of his cestui que trusts requires payment to be so made. Not to pay in the manner most advantageous to the tax-payers of the country is a plain violation of the known duty of the Secretary. It seems to me to be an obvious fact that it is the interest of the people to utilize the silver dollar by requiring the Secretary to pay the interest they owe with it. There has been a constant struggle, or a bold pretense of an earnest effort, ever since the war closed to reduce the burdens of taxation by the reduction of the interest-bearing debt of the United States. Sinking funds have been maintained, even by large increase of taxation, to make it certain that the bonded debt should be annually reduced. The refunding act of July 14, 1870, which authorized the issue of $200,000,000 of 5 per cent., $300,000,000 of 4½ per cent., and $1,000,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds, making principal and interest payable in gold or silver coin of the then standard value and exempting them from all taxation, Federal, State, and municipal, added this provision:

> But nothing in this act, or in any law now in force, shall be construed to authorize any increase whatever of the bonded debt of the United States.

The republican party have constantly insisted that the reduction of the bonded debt and consequent relief from the taxation necessary to provide for the annual interest thereon, was their chief merit and their strongest claim for a continuance in power; yet in the face of all these things the Secretary of the Treasury shows by his reports that in order to enforce resumption of specie payments he had from the 1st day of November, 1875, to the 1st day of November, 1878, increased the principal of the interest-bearing bonded debt of the country $104,499,450, and in his last monthly report, issued on the 1st day of January, 1879, he shows that he has increased the principal of our bonds still further, from $1,798,750,750 to $1,809,812,850, being a further increase of $11,062,100 in the last two months, making an increase of the bonded debt in the last three years and two months of $115,561,550, which, at 5 per cent. per annum, adds to the taxation of the people annually $5,778,077, or at 4½ per cent. interest $5,200,269. The Secretary shows by his reports that the annual interest has been increased very largely in the last two years. This is not a flattering exhibit at a time of unparalleled depression of property and business, when taxation, direct and indirect, is already almost beyond endurance. But we have been so accustomed to talk about millions lately that we hardly realize the magnitude of the burden the Secretary has imposed upon the country.

If Senators will turn to the finance report for 1877, pages 14 and 15, they will find that the annual expenditures of the Government of the United States for all ordinary purposes—executive, legislative, and judicial, war, Navy, pensions, Indians, everything from the foundation of the Government up to and including 1861—never reached $73,000,000, and including the public debt and interest the gross expenditures never reached $83,000,000 a year. Yet Secretary Sherman can in three years and two months, without consulting Congress, add $115,561,550 to the principal of the bonded debt and over $5,000,000 to the annual taxation of the country to pay the interest on the increased debt, and be applauded as a great financier for doing it. By looking at the same pages of the finance report it will be seen that the ordinary expenditures of the Government for all purposes for the twenty-one years from 1791 to 1811, inclusive, were $99,922,560, or an average of $4,758,000 a year, being hundreds of thousands of dollars less than Secretary Sherman has imposed upon us annually already. This additional interest makes a sum very much larger, 50 per cent. more, than is received from the tax on all the circulation loaned to all the national banks in the United States and the tax on their capital added; and the Secretary advises us in his last report that he claims and intends to exercise the right to issue and sell as many more bonds as he pleases, even after resumption is supposed to be an accomplished fact, as will enable him to hoard gold enough to pay at all times in the future all demands that may be made upon the Treasury. How much he may by this process increase the bonded debt and the burdens of taxation is, he assumes, a question for him to decide and for the Congress of the United States to furnish him the means to carry out as he pleases, without asking the leave of the representatives of the people. Of course he will maintain resumption upon these terms as long as anybody will buy bonds and the people will submit to taxation. Whether the increase of bonded debt will be $200,000,000 or $500,000,000 is for the autocrat of the Treasury to determine. Prince Bismarck was right when he said:

> He who holds the money-bags controls the politics of the country.

Or, as Burke expressed it—

> The treasury is the state.

Fortunately there are laws which even the Secretary can be compelled to obey, and one of them is that all coin received from customs dues shall be held as a special fund and applied, first, to the payment of the interest on the public debt. Fortunately we can buy silver bullion and coin it into legal-tender silver dollars without costing the people a cent, and men will pay it at the custom-house, as shown by the Secretary's statement that at least $11,260,000 of it had been so paid in the first five months of the current fiscal year. At even this rate, and it will increase as the monthly coinage adds to its volume, a sufficient amount will be received to pay all our annual interest in silver coin, the estimate being that $25,000,000 of coin kept in use will enable the Government to pay as it matures $97,000,000 of interest.

The question recurs, why should the Secretary be allowed to increase the bonded debt of the country in order to obtain gold to hoard for resumption purposes, and pay out the gold bought at such a price as interest to bondholders, when he has silver coin in abundance, which is being coined without loss, indeed at a profit, to the people, with which to pay the interest we owe? Surely it is no answer to say that the creditors ask for and prefer gold to silver coin, and therefore he sells bonds, pays interest, and imposes taxes to get it to please or enrich them. It is the clear duty of the Secretary to pay the interest we owe in the coin that costs us least. It is our option, not the creditors', and Congress ought to see to it that the laws are executed in the interest of the people.

The present Secretary of the Treasury understands the law precisely as I do; he knows what his duty is, and fully appreciates his obligation, as the chief financial officer of the Government, to pay the coin received from customs dues, first to satisfy the interest on the national debt. He has said with great emphasis in this Chamber that the act of 1862 was a specific pledge of the coin received from customs: first, to the payment of interest on the public debt; second, to the payment of the sinking fund, and that only the residue of the coin thus received was subject to appropriation. He maintained that it was a fund mortgaged to the bondholders, and that any Secretary who dared to divert it to any other use ought to be impeached. He showed, what we all know to be true, that Congress had, in accordance with the act of 1862, (see Revised Statutes, section 3689,) made a permanent annual appropriation of the coin received from customs, first to pay the interest, and, second, to provide for the sinking fund, so that it could not, without palpable violation of law, be touched by the Secretary for any other purpose, however urgent or meritorious. I read on page 1946, part 3, of RECORD of second session, Forty-third Congress, from Secretary (then Senator) Sherman's speech on the sinking fund bill, March 1, 1875. He said:

In regard to the first alternative, I say that by no vote of mine, under any circumstances, will I suspend or stop for a moment the operation of the sinking-fund laws. They are pledges of public faith that must be observed literally and truly, and I am very glad the Secretary of the Treasury has taken the position that whatever else comes that sinking fund shall be maintained. Indeed, the law in regard to the sinking fund is so clear, so strong, that a Secretary of the Treasury who would violate that law would clearly be subject to and ought to be impeached. That law is an element of the public credit and must not be impaired. Let us look a moment. The sinking-fund acts are pretty familiar to the Senate, but they will bear repetition. By the act passed at the beginning of the war—February 25, 1862—the customs duties are expressly pledged, first, to the payment of the interest in coin on the bonds of the United States; second, to the purchase or payment of one per cent. of the entire debt of the United States; and third, the residue thereof only to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the customs duties which were to be collected in gold were set aside and mortgaged just as sacredly as if I should mortgage the house in which I live, set aside as a fund to be applied to specific purposes, and that it is only the balance of this fund that can be used by the United States for other purposes. That is perfectly clear, and to that the public faith is pledged. That law is still the existing law.

It would be difficult for any Senator on this floor to express more clearly and forcibly than Secretary Sherman did in the extract I have read the two facts I seek to maintain; first, that the coin received for customs dues must be paid out for interest on the public debt, it being a fund set apart specifically by law and by permanent appropriation for that purpose; second, that the failure so to apply it, or its use by the Secretary for any other purpose, is a plain violation of his known duty as a public officer, for which he is liable to the most severe punishment. In the same speech the Secretary, after quoting from the law of 1870 to show that the pledge of the coin to the sinking fund is as sacred as that to pay the interest, proceeds to say—

It was an express appropriation of money out of this special fund for this special purpose, and no officer of the Government has any right whatever either to violate the law or to take this money appropriated especially out of a special fund to pay ordinary and current expenses. That is perfectly clear. First, by the act of February 25, 1862, the fund is made, the mortgage is created, and here by the act of July, 1870, an express appropriation is made to be paid out of the special fund for this special purpose. There is no power or authority that can be granted to any man by an appropriation bill to disturb this sacred pledge, and I trust the promise of the Secretary of the Treasury will be made good; that the sinking fund will be maintained at all hazards, whatever other appropriations are disregarded and set aside.

And here I wish to say that an appropriation bill is nothing but an appropriation of "money not otherwise appropriated." An appropriation bill even for our pay is an appropriation of money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but this sinking fund is permanently appropriated and permanently pledged, and must first be paid. It is like the interest on the public debt exactly. The sinking fund must be maintained inviolate, and no authority must disturb it. I blame no one for the temporary deficiency in this fund by reason of the unforeseen difficulties that surrounded us after the panic of 1873. Then the sinking fund was not maintained; but now that our attention is called to the law clearly and distinctly it is apparent that thirty millions of the money received from customs must be annually set aside for the sinking fund, and no law in the ordinary form of an appropriation bill can disturb it.

It will thus be seen that the Secretary fully understands not only the force and effect of the laws specifically pledging the coin received from customs dues to the payment of the interest due to the bondholders, but he insists upon giving full force and effect to the laws of Congress making permanent appropriations of specific funds for specified purposes. Therefore, unless he can show some law authorizing him to divert the silver coin paid for customs dues from the purposes to which it was by general law and specific appropriation devoted, he is guilty of official misconduct if he does not pay it as the law directs. I showed conclusively at the last session of this Congress, by the statements of the Secretary to the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives, made on the 1st and 4th of April, 1878, that he wholly disregarded and ignored all the laws he had so zealously maintained in 1875, and now uses the (so-called) sinking fund as a slush fund in his hands to retire greenbacks, buy up fractional currency, and do anything with that he sees fit, thus constituting himself absolute autocrat over all revenue collected by the tax-gatherer and not used in payment of the ordinary expenses of the Government. I invite the attention of Senators to that speech, made on the 28th day of May, 1878, (RECORD, part 4, page 3860.) There never was a more dangerous power usurped by an executive officer; and when I, in absolute good faith, offered a resolution reciting that the sinking fund had been not only provided for but exceeded by $220,000,000, and therefore Congress ought to direct what disposition should be made of the surplus revenue, so as to have it appropriated under the authority and direction of Congress as the Constitution requires it to be, and when I showed by the admissions of the Secretary that he was paying no attention to the provisions of the act of 1875 in regard to this great fund, the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] unable to answer the facts, relying doubtless on his standing and position in this body as chairman of its Finance Committee, and thinking that he could whistle me down the wind by a smart repartee, said he had always liked to hear the speech I made on that subject, and his republican brethren enjoyed the wit of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. In less than sixty days new men and other ideas will control that committee, and the Senator from Vermont will be on a level with the balance of us. We will then see whether he and his executive officers can knowingly and willfully disobey and laugh at the laws of the land and use the revenues of this Government as though they were their private property. I sought in good faith to relieve the Secretary by a resolution of both Houses declaring that the law relating to the sinking fund had been anticipated, and therefore its provisions did not require what Senator Sherman in 1875 said was required of the Secretary, or impeachment not only should but would follow disobedience; but the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] on the 30th day of April, 1878, (see RECORD, part 3, page 2953,) reported back my resolution in regard to the sinking fund adversely, saying:

Among other things, it seems to contemplate the repeal of an existing law and to give certain instructions to the Secretary of the Treasury, which cannot be done by concurrent resolution.

That law being still in force, the Finance Committee being the authority, all the penalties denounced by Senator Sherman in 1875 against the conduct of which Secretary Sherman in 1878 is, by his own confession, guilty ought to follow as no Senator will venture to say that a Secretary of the Treasury can be allowed willfully and knowingly to violate his duty. Whatever may be the effect of anticipated payments to the sinking fund, it is absolutely certain that the annual interest on the bonded debt has not been anticipated, and the specific pledge, mortgage, call it what you please, the appropriation by law of the silver coin received by the Government in payment of tariff taxation is as absolute and as binding on the Secretary of the Treasury as it was when he insisted on impeaching any Secretary who did not faithfully apply it specifically to the payment of the interest on the bonded debt, regardless of the provisions necessary for the maintenance of any other of the obligations of the Government. He admits that he is knowingly and willfully violating the law by refusing to so apply the silver coin, and I ask the Committee on Finance to report, by bill or otherwise, some measure which will compel him to obey it or make it necessary for the President to change his Secretary. The resumption act cannot be appealed to to shield the Secretary in this matter as it has been in regard to the sinking fund.

I know that the claim is set up by indirection, that any funds may be used under the resumption act that may be found necessary for that purpose. The only authority given to the Secretary that I am aware of to use public money in aid of resumption is in the last clause of the third section of the resumption act, which reads thus:

And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues, from time to time, in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid; and all provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Approved, January 14, 1875.

It will hardly be assumed by the Secretary, in the face of the facts I have quoted from his own speeches, that the silver received for customs dues is "surplus revenue," especially when he in his annual reports has for years past assured us that there have been deficiencies each year; and he will hardly turn round and so far contradict the speech from which I have read as to assert that silver coin received from customs is surplus revenue "in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," when he has shown from the statutes that, both by general statute and specific permanent appropriation, it is devoted as specifically as if it were mortgaged to the payment of interest on the public debt.

Senators may differ as to the policy of the silver bill. I approve it; but I know many think that gold ought to be the exclusive standard of value and quote the depreciation of silver bullion in the markets of the world against the justice of paying interest in silver coin. That is not the question; all these things may be arguments in favor of a repeal of the law. The question now is, shall the Secretary of the Treasury be required to obey the law, or may he disregard it with impunity? I insist that he must obey and execute it, so long as it is the law. There can be no stability, no safety in administration, if executive officers can annul or defy congressional action, as they too often do. Half of our deficiency bills arise from executive disregard of law. The frightful increase of the principal of our interest-bearing debt, nearly $90,000,000 in the last year with the threat of indefinite increase hereafter, is the result of the determination of the Secretary to ignore the provisions of the silver bill and make gold the sole standard of values in defiance of Congress. Every step taken by him is in favor of incomes against production. That is the struggle. It is not between capital and labor. Active capital is the friend and indispensable ally of labor. To prevent the destruction of industries this Congress prohibited by law the further contraction of the currency; yet the Treasurer's last report shows that on the 1st day of July last the legal-tender notes of the denominations from one to fifty dollars had been decreased $10,914,116 below what were outstanding on the 1st day of July, 1877, while notes of the denomination of $100 increased $2,407,800 during the same period, and orders looking to still further substitution of notes of large denominations for small notes have been already issued.

Contraction of the currency can be carried out quite as effectually by the withdrawal of the only denominations of notes that enter into retail trade and the every-day transactions of life, and by the substitution therefor of notes of large denominations, as in any other way. And the Secretary tells us that he is looking to still further issues of notes of large denominations, although the statute approved May 31, 1878, which repeals all acts and parts of acts in conflict with it, orders the further retirement of legal-tender notes to stop, and provides that the same notes received at the Treasury from any source shall be reissued, paid out, and kept in circulation, and shall not be either canceled or destroyed. It must be obvious that any power the Secretary had under any previous law to change the denomination of legal-tender notes was by this act taken from him, as it would be impossible for him to issue other notes without inflating the currency to the extent of the issue of the notes of larger or other denominations, he being peremptorily ordered not to cancel or destroy the notes received. The words "re-issued," "paid out again," and "kept in circulation" necessarily require the original notes to be kept in circulation. The proviso of the act makes this construction absolutely certain, even when notes are received so mutilated that they cannot be re-issued, paid out again, or kept in circulation; other notes of like denomination must be issued in their stead. Congress did not intend to give the Secretary the power even to change the denomination of the small fragment of the $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes that might become mutilated and unfit for reissue, yet the Secretary, in plain violation of law and of his known duty, is contracting the currency by the substitution of large for small notes, and avows his intention to continue to do so.

The act of May 31, 1878, (see page 87 of the acts of the last session of this Congress,) reads as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, or other officer under him, to cancel or retire any more of the United States legal-tender notes; and when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation: Provided, That nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation and destruction of mutilated notes and the issue of other notes of like denomination in their stead, as now provided by law.

All acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Senators will be astonished, if they take the trouble to examine how small a proportion of the outstanding legal-tender notes are in any available form in circulation among the people for their daily wants, when the amount which has been lost or destroyed by fire and flood in the last fourteen years is deducted, (and it is a very large sum.) Some idea of it may be formed when it is stated that from ½ to 1 per cent. is the yearly estimate of loss, and when we find $16,000,000 of fractional currency outstanding yet, notwithstanding all the efforts to retire it, out of an issue of less than $50,000,000, it being now almost certain that one-fourth of the fractional currency is lost or destroyed in the hands of the people. That is, of course, a larger proportion of loss than the legal-tender notes will show, but the loss in regard to them will amount to many millions of dollars. Add to that the large amount held in the Treasury and the amount required to be kept in reserve by the national banks and hoarded by them in preparing for resumption, and it is very doubtful if there is anything like one-half of the outstanding legal-tender notes in circulation. If the Secretary, who takes in $120,000,000 a year for internal revenue and now issues his order to receive legal-tender notes for customs dues, proceeds, as he is doing, to convert them into notes of large denominations, and refuses to pay out silver coin for interest, as he is doing, the people will have no currency soon, except what the national banks supply, such as is needed to pay daily or weekly wages, railroad fares, market bills, or retail dealings generally. Against the illegal exercise of a power producing such results I protest.

Again, the Treasurer of the United States, in his last report, dated November 1, 1878, page 7, says:

The total amount of standard silver dollars coined under the above act to date is $18,282,500, of which amount there is in the mints and offices $13,359,877, and in circulation $4,922,623.

This statement is made in the face of the fact that the Secretary and Treasurer, in the response to my resolution which I now seek to refer, say that at least $1,500,000 in actual silver coin and $11,260,000 in coin certificates for silver coin have been actually deposited in the Treasury and transferred absolutely to the United States in payment of customs dues, and shows an absolute violation of the plain provisions of section 3694 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

The coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Third. The residue to be paid into the Treasury.

If these things do not require investigation by the Committee on Finance, I do not see what use the Senate has for the committee, whether it aids or obstructs resumption.

One word on another subject. No man in Congress or out of it has struggled harder than I have for many years to obtain the passage of a law authorizing the receipt of legal-tender notes for customs dues. The Finance Committee has a bill for that purpose, introduced by me, before it now, and ought to report it at once, so that we can pass it. The House has already passed a similar one. Notwithstanding my anxiety to see that bill become a law, I would not allow the Secretary of the Treasury to receive these notes for customs dues, as he is doing now, in defiance of law. He has argued with great ability in his report to show why these notes should now be received for customs dues. I agree with him; but they should be received in accordance with law and not in plain violation of it. His object is to receive them when it suits him and refuse them when it does not, so as to make him autocrat. My purpose is to establish his duties, powers, and rights by law, which all men can examine and understand, and not leave the business of the country subject to the whim or caprice of the Secretary. The chancellor's conscience shall not be measured by the chancellor's foot if I can help it. The servant is not above his master, and the Secretary must understand that Congress makes laws and that he is bound to obey them. I think I could show that his sale of $50,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds to the syndicate in April last and the payment of $250,000 commission and double interest thereon, with the enormous loans made to pet banks, were not in accordance with law nor in the interest of the people, who have shown a willingness to take at 4 per cent. all the bonds the Government has for sale and to spend the interest at home and thus restore an honest balance of trade in our favor. But I am not seeking to arraign the Secretary. I only desire to urge upon the Finance Committee of the Senate to adopt or at least recommend such measures as will compel him to carry out in good faith the provisions of existing laws relative to silver coin and currency and the uses to which they must be applied, and to let him know that he is our agent, bound by law so long as they are on the statute-books to do as the laws direct, whether he likes them or not. That done, there will be no pretense of excuse for the further increase of the interest-bearing bonded debt of the country nor for the imposition of new burdens of taxation on the country. Seven hundred millions of 6 per cent. bonds can in two years be reduced to four percents without the intervention of syndicates, and taxation to pay interest on them reduced $14,000,000 annually.

That is all I care to say at present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ALLISON. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was read by the Secretary.

The resolution was agreed to.

FUNERAL OF REPRESENTATIVE HARTRIDGE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution providing that the funeral ceremonies of Hon. JULIAN HARTRIDGE, late a Representative in that body from the State of Georgia, shall be held at three o'clock p. m. this day in the Hall of the House of Representatives, and inviting the Senate to attend at that hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions of the House of Representatives will be reported by the Secretary.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 9, 1879.

Resolved, That the funeral ceremonies of Hon. JULIAN HARTRIDGE, late a Representative in this body from the State of Georgia, be held at three o'clock p. m. this day in this Hall.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolution to the Senate and invite the Senate to attend the said funeral ceremonies.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution and ask for its consideration:

Resolved, That, pursuant to the invitation of the House of Representatives, the Senate will attend the funeral ceremony of Hon. JULIAN HARTRIDGE, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Georgia, in the Hall of the House of Representatives this day at three o'clock.

The resolution was considered and agreed to unanimously.

NOTICES OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, and the unfinished business of the Senate is the bill (S. No. 309) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, on which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURNSIDE. By permission of the Senator from New Hampshire I desire to state to the Senate that it was my intention to make a motion this morning to take up the bill for the reorganization of the Army, with a view to lay it aside and allow the patent bill to be proceeded with; but as I am sure such a motion would meet with opposition, I have decided not to make it, but to ask the Senate at the termination of the debate on the patent bill, or at any time when the patent bill may be laid aside, to take up the bill for the reorganization of the Army. The bill is now indicated on the Calendar as a special order, and I shall not make a motion at this time to take it up. I beg to state that there are some mistakes in the printing of the bill, and I ask permission of the Senate to have the bill reprinted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To which the Chair hears no objection, and that order will be entered.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask that the bill (S. No. 241) for the relief of the Methodist Episcopal Church South at Charleston, Kanawha County, West Virginia, be made the special order for next Monday after the morning hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think we ought to have any more special orders.

Mr. CONKLING. Nor do I.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will not insist on that motion.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I shall be obliged to call for the regular order.

Mr. HEREFORD. If there is to be discussion I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from West Virginia can give notice that he will move to take the bill up at that time, which accomplishes exactly the same purpose, and is a little better in fact.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MORGAN, to strike out lines 30 to 35, inclusive, of the second section, in the following words:

> And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff or the defense of the defendant was vexatious and malicious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the defeated party such sum, by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit, as it shall deem just and reasonable.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

> And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff or the defense of the defendant was vexatious or malicious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the party guilty of such vexatious or malicious conduct, or of such infringement, such sum by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit as it shall deem just and reasonable.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, this bill proposes certain amendments to the patent laws to increase their efficiency and remove some defects which time and experience have revealed in them. The evils produced by those defects have in some localities rendered the whole patent system unpopular and created a clamor for its virtual abolition. With that clamor I have little sympathy. It demands a remedy which is worse than the disease. All the vexatious annoyances to which the patent laws have given rise are counterbalanced more than a hundred-fold by the benefits which they have conferred. They are intimately connected with our national progress, to which they have vastly contributed, and should be improved rather than repealed. If this bill becomes a law, I believe it will render them less odious, without impairing their vigor, and thus avert the impending storm which threatens their existence.

Patent laws are based upon the principle that the making and publication of useful inventions should be encouraged for the promotion of the public welfare. They do not, as is sometimes asserted, rest upon the absolute right of inventors nor seek to reward them except so far as to promote the public good. Webster, with his usual force, once likened the inventor's right of property to that of the savage in the canoe which his labor fashions from the tree of the forest. But the natural sense of justice would hardly accord to the wild mechanic a monopoly in any improvement which his experience or skill suggested; still less would it prohibit any subsequent inventor of the same improvement from using it.

It rarely happens that any important invention is the work of one person alone. The utility of such inventions has generally been obvious for a long time; many minds have sought for them; they have been approached step by step until some lucky person, instructed perhaps by the multiplied failures of others, hits upon the element essential to success.

Some very lucrative inventions have been merely obvious applications of widely-known scientific discoveries. For instance, about a third of a century ago Liebig had discovered and shown how bone-earth might be made a soluble manure by mixing it with sulphuric acid. Some manufacturers of artificial manures applied this discovery to coprolites or fossil excretions of extinct animals—vast beds of which exist in the Old World and in our own country—procured letters-patent for that application of the process, and held a monopoly of it for fourteen years. This so-called invention required no inventive talent and very little mental labor. It was so easy an application of a well-known discovery that it might not now be held to be the subject of a patent. But nevertheless it illustrates forcibly the rule that the exclusive right granted to patentees does not depend upon their merits. He who takes the last step to success, however easy and unimportant it may be, is alone rewarded. He who can prove priority, if only for an hour, wins the prize, though strict justice may require the lion's share of it to be given to others. This seeming injustice results from the fact already stated, that patent laws rest upon the public welfare rather than upon the absolute rights or merits of inventors. Priority of invention is alone rewarded to stimulate inventors to win success and show the public the pathway to it at the earliest possible moment.

The inventor may, if he chooses, conceal his invention. If he does others may discover and patent it. But the patent law says to him, "Publish your invention—give it to the world and for seventeen years you shall have the exclusive right to it." Without this promise to inventors, and the belief on their part that it would be kept, many valuable inventions if made at all would have been concealed and lost to the world. Many arts known to ancient and mediæval manufacturers were practiced in secret, were handed down as heirlooms from father to son until they were finally lost and have never been rediscovered. A few of those "lost arts" have furnished a subject for a fascinating lecture to one of the most eloquent of American orators. Such instances even now are by no means rare. I know the inventor of a very ingenious machine which gives to him the virtual monopoly of a certain trade, who has never procured a patent for it but conceals it from the public. He prefers a monopoly based on secrecy alone to the exclusive right which the law grants in terms but too often fails to protect. The public may thus forever be deprived of his invention. Legislation hostile to patents will not only tend to prevent the making of inventions but to deprive the public from deriving any benefit from such as are made.

The patent system appeals not only to the inventor's love of approbation, but also to that love of gain which underlies so much of human enterprise and effort. I know it is sometimes asserted that inventors need not the stimulus of pecuniary reward, but that they must execute the law of their being, which is to invent. They are likened to poets, and we are asked with an air of triumph if money could have induced Homer to sing the siege of Troy or Milton to write the Paradise Lost. But such comparisons and arguments are vain. The excellence of a poem depends mainly upon the force of the author's imagination, but the making of inventions calls into action other and radically different mental qualities. Nature yields her mighty talismans and hoarded secrets to no idle dreamer. No brilliancy of imagination can wrest them from her. The inventor's feet must rest upon the solid earth. To conquer the difficulties which confront him generally requires a thorough practical knowledge of mechanical forces and pertinent scientific facts, and the power of combining them and reasoning logically from them. The means he uses, the ends he seeks, are all material. The utility of his invention is the sign and the measure of his success. It must not only be useful, but most useful. Unless it furnishes the best and cheapest method of producing some useful result, it is unprofitable and therefore worthless. Such a struggle, with such means and for such ends, begets no scorn of wealth, but rather a keener appreciation of its power and its uses.

Hence it follows that inventors universally either apply for patents or use their inventions secretly in the hope of obtaining pecuniary profit. Without that hope the genius of invention would languish. Nearly all great inventions result from the anxious, sleepless toil of years and costly experiments which impoverish their creators. Few men, if any, would make such sacrifice to create inventions if they could have in them no exclusive right. A few glittering prizes laboriously won by men like Watt and Arkwright in England, and Howe and McCormick in this country, lure thousands of ingenious minds into efforts and experiments which are rarely successful, but whose failure lights the way to success.

We must bear in mind, too, the fact that the success of inventions rarely depends upon inventors alone. Most of them are poor, and few of them could procure the funds necessary to perfect their inventions and introduce them into use except by assigning a share in them when completed, which would be impossible without a patent law. No one would advance money to perfect the invention of another in which there could be no right of property. Hence it is that the greatest inventions of modern times are due to patent laws, and have been made in the few countries where such laws exist.

History furnishes almost countless illustrations of the truth of what I have said. The case of James Watt, the inventor of the steam-engine, is a typical one. That stupendous invention has been to modern civilization what the genii were to the hero of oriental fable. Yet the facts seem to show conclusively that without the encouragement and protection afforded by a patent law it would never have been made and completed for use. At the very threshold of Watt's experiments he had exhausted all his own means. His first associate, to whom he assigned two-thirds of his invention, was soon reduced to bankruptcy. He then applied for assistance to Matthew Boulton, a manufacturer of great wealth and surpassing skill. Six years of his patent had then expired. It had only eight more to run, and that time was too short to perfect the invention and get it into use so as to realize any profit from it. Parliament, upon petition, granted a new patent for twenty-four years, in which Boulton invested his wealth, energy, and business talent. Yet the struggle for success was long, arduous, and doubtful. Workmen had to be laboriously trained to make and run the engines. Doubt, ridicule, the fear of failure, and the passive force of conservatism rendered it well-nigh impossible to introduce the invention, and when its utility had been demonstrated infringers seized upon it and created a ruinous competition. The four and twenty years had nearly gone before it began to yield a return for the toil, anxiety, and money which it had cost.

Such is usually the fate of even the most successful inventors. Without a patent law, nay without a patent law giving the right to freely assign inventions, we should even now have been without the steam-engine and hundreds of other important discoveries which have changed the face of the world and given to modern civilization its distinctive features. This is as susceptible of proof as any proposition not purely mathematical can be. Imagine, if you can, what our civilization would now be without those inventions, and then, if you can, legislate in a spirit hostile to the system which created them. The legislator who, in obedience to prejudice caused by temporary grievances, destroys or cripples that system is likely to be classed with the caliph who burned the Alexandrian library with its accumulated treasures of ages.

It is sometimes urged by the opponents of patent laws that many great and useful inventions were made before such laws existed. They point to the printing-press, gunpowder, the magnetic needle, telescopes, watches, and the galvanic circuit. But those were due either to some lucky accident which revealed unsought mysteries of nature or to an ingenious application of the simplest mechanical forces. Few of these as they stood before patent laws had added to them countless improvements were the product of long and intelligent study, numerous experiments, and a mastery of scientific truths. The rude hand-worked presses of Faust or Guttenberg or Franklin no more resembled the gigantic machines which in a few hours print a million copies of a metropolitan newspaper than the acorn resembles the giant oak. All early mechanical inventions have been similarly improved, and those improvements are nearly all due to patent laws.

I wish here to refer to an argument or rather a piece of rhetoric which is often used against patents. We are told with great emphasis that they are oppressive monopolies, which originated in royal favor, and which are hostile to the spirit of our free institutions. But, sir, it seems to me that patent systems are the outgrowth of that bold spirit of inquiry and audacious enterprise which chafe even in golden chains and war against despotism in all its forms. The genius of invention avoids the nation composed only of masters and slaves. The latter, whose lot is hopeless, do not aspire to invent; the former, despising labor, will not stoop to invent. The stupendous monuments of ancient civilization were reared by millions of toiling hands, little aided by any but the simplest mechanical powers. Great as they were, they dwindle into insignificance when compared with the countless triumphs which our own nation, young as she is, has won over nature.

The first patent law ever passed was the result of a successful struggle with arbitrary power. Up to the year 1624 the English sovereigns granted monopolies to their favorites, not only in new inventions, but in various kinds of trade and manufacturing, which had before been open to all the freemen of the realm. Against the latter odious monopolies Parliament protested so vigorously that, in 1597, Queen Elizabeth promised to "examine all patents and abide the touchstone of the law." This gracious answer proved evasive, and the evil increased till her courtiers monopolized nearly all the trade and manufactures of the realm. Even the dealing in many of the necessaries of life was burdened by oppressive restrictions. In 1601 the indignation of Parliament broke out afresh. The long list of oppressive monopolies was read to the wrathful Commons.

"Nay," thundered one bold representative, "if no remedy be found for these, bread will be there before the next Parliament."

The assurance of Cecil, the prime minister, that all existing monopolies should be repealed, and no more granted, quelled the rising storm. But under James I, who was ignorant of the spirit of the people and surrounded by worthless and greedy parasites, the evil was renewed. In 1621 the same Parliament which degraded Bacon from the chancellorship for corruption impeached and exiled Mompesson for practicing extortion under a patent for licensing inns and ale-houses. Its dissolution and the vindictive punishment of its leaders soon followed. But the next Parliament, in 1624, passed the famous statute which declared the granting of monopolies in existing trade and manufactures to be contrary to law and the known liberties of the English people, but which enlarged the privileges of inventors by treating as a right the exclusive use of their inventions which they had before received only from the grace of the monarch.

Under the theory of the English constitution that law required the monarch to grant patents to inventors who complied with the legal formalities. Within six and twenty years after the passage of that act a great revolution swept away the throne and the House of Lords, sent the King to the block, and erased from the tables of English law the last trace of kingly or ecclesiastical tyranny; but the patent law evoked no hostility. It has survived substantially unchanged the restoration of the Stuarts, the revolution of 1688, and the peaceful revolution which for nearly two centuries has been silently transferring the scepter from the King and Lords to the House of Commons. Under it and by it Great Britain has been the workshop of the world. Her inventors have given to her machinery which is equivalent to the labor of more than four hundred millions of men. With the experience of more than two centuries and a half the only change she proposes to make in her patent law will bring it more closely to our own.

Nor, Mr. President, does the history of the patent law in this country furnish any evidence of the truth of the charge that it is hostile to freedom. Under the principle of the statute of monopolies some of the English colonies in America granted patents to inventors. An intelligent gentleman of my own State has referred me to an act of the general court of the colony of Massachusetts Bay, passed in 1646, granting to one of his ancestors, Joseph Jencks, the exclusive right of making and selling his improved scythe for the term of fourteen years. That I think was the first patent granted to an inventor in America. The improvement referred to changed the short, thick, straight English scythe into the longer, thinner, curved implement with stiffened back now in use.

The great statesmen of our revolutionary period imbedded the germ of a patent law in our Federal Constitution. It empowers Congress "to promote the progress of science and the useful arts by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings or discoveries." The first act in execution of this power was passed in 1790, and was repealed and superseded by the act of 1793. The latter act, with slight modification, remained in force till 1836, when the law was completely revised. Up to 1836 patents were granted here as in England, merely upon application, without proof of their value or originality. The statute of 1836 established the Patent Office, in charge of an officer intrusted with the power and charged with the duty of rejecting applications for want of value or originality. Since 1836 our patent system has suffered no great change.

The Patent Office is self-sustaining. The fees received by it have paid all its expenses and have furnished a surplus of more than a million and a half dollars to the Treasury. That surplus for the year 1877 was more than $100,000, and more than $68,000 for the year ending June 30, 1878, notwithstanding the threat of hostile legislation, the hard times, and the loss occasioned by the partial destruction of the Patent Office by fire.

France first passed a patent law in 1791, in the enthusiasm for national progress inspired by her great revolution. It has outlived all the radical changes in her government, and has contributed much to her prosperity. In these three countries and under their patent laws nearly all great labor-saving inventions have been made.

The existence of a patent law in England one hundred and sixty-seven years before France had one will help account for the fact that the inventive triumphs of the former far surpass those of the latter country. But in two respects we have had great advantages over both England and France; first in the cheapness of our patent system, and, secondly, in the power of rejecting an application for want of value or originality, which makes a patent more valuable when granted. In those countries very few laboring-men could procure the means to get patents, and that inability has chilled and benumbed the inventive faculties of their artisans. The cheapness with which a patent could be procured here has made us not only a nation of inventors but has given to our workmen an eagerness for improvement, a willingness to adopt new methods, and a dexterity both mental and manual which has made them the most efficient artisans of this or any age. To their ingenuity and matchless skill we owe our only chance for success in the international contest now being waged for the scepter of commercial and productive supremacy. Without that ingenuity and skill which are due to our patent system as much or more than to all other causes a successful conflict with the cheaper labor of other lands would be utterly hopeless. This is not my view alone, but that of the most intelligent American manufacturers, some of the most eminent of whom reside in my own State and who have given me much valuable information.

These views are confirmed by the highest European authority. Mr. Bally, one of the commissioners from the Republic of Switzerland to the international exposition in Philadelphia in 1876, and the largest manufacturer of boots and shoes in Europe, upon his return home addressed to Swiss manufacturers a letter evincing much practical wisdom and the keenest intelligence. In it he warns his countrymen that unless they adopt a patent system like ours, and thus encourage new inventions, the United States will conquer them in industrial warfare. He says of us:

> Another factor which aids to favor the education of the people is the excellent system of patents, by means of which at a very moderate expense a patent is obtained; not only the inventor is protected against infringement but the invention is made known, and the American more than any one else loves inventions and adopts them the moment they are recognized as good.
> Many European states have also a patent system, but as they see in it first of all a source of revenue for the state, those of moderate fortune can hardly obtain a patent. In Europe the inventor anxiously hides his secret from all eyes until he is in possession of his patent. The Americans do not know this uneasiness, because there the inventor alone can take a patent, which he afterward has the right to sell if he pleases.
> Every intelligent man has thus before him the possibility of fortune, often by a very slight improvement, and this keeps in ceaseless activity the intelligent part of the population. I am satisfied from my knowledge that no people has made in so short a time so many useful inventions as the Americans; and if to-day machinery apparently does all the work, it nevertheless by no means reduces the workman to a machine. He uses it as a machine, it is true; but he is always thinking about some improvement to introduce into it, and often his thoughts lead to fine inventions or useful improvements.

Again he says, in referring to our shoe manufactures:

> A manufacturer complained to me of the high wages he was obliged to pay. He could not find workmen at less than $2 a day, which he said prevented him from thinking of exporting; but I added up from his books the wages which he paid for piece-work, and I saw that the price per piece which I pay for the same article is almost double his, and nevertheless my men grumble at the work. My workmen work also with American machines. They have the same tools, but their productive capacity is far inferior to that of the American operative. The same observation has been made to me by superintendents who have established German shoe factories after the American system, and who often cannot succeed with German workmen.

He sums up by this remarkable and emphatic declaration:

> We have but one thing to do if we will avoid the entire decadence of our industry, and that is to imitate the Americans.

The report of the British commissioners to Parliament on the same exposition has a similar tone. On page 135 of that report, under the head of "textiles," is the following:

> As regards extent of invention and ingenuity the United States was far ahead of other nations. * * * The extraordinary extent of ingenuity and invention existing in the United States and manifested throughout the exhibition I attributed to the natural aptitude of the people, fostered and stimulated by an admirable patent law and system, and to the appreciation of inventions by the people generally.

Sir William Thompson, president of the mathematical and physical section of the British Association, said to his associates and countrymen in September, 1876:

If Europe does not amend its patent laws (England in the opposite direction to that proposed in the bills before the last two sessions of Parliament) America will speedily become the nursery of useful inventions for the world.

Such, Mr. President, is the testimony of our industrial foes, and it can be multiplied indefinitely. They see in our patent system the magical weapon which insures our victory and their own subjugation. They earnestly appeal to their respective countrymen to adopt it to prevent the scepter of manufacturing supremacy from passing over the ocean into the hands of the great Republic of the west.

Sir, these declarations of our own manufacturers and admissions of their foreign rivals are supported by the statistics of our industrial and inventive growth. Let us compare the increase of our patent system with our swift advance in productive greatness.

During the first ten years of our patent system, from 1790 to 1801, only about 150 patents were granted in each year, and up to the passage of the act of 1836 only 10,020 had been granted in all. Since that time more than 200,000 have been issued, notwithstanding the rejection of from 35 to 50 per cent. of all those applied for. The present annual issue is about 13,000, while that of Great Britain, under a system requiring no rejections, is only about 4,000. This increase in our patent system was most remarkable at two periods. The first was about the year 1854. The average annual issue for four years previous to that year was only 961, while for the six years following it was 2,931. The second period was from 1860 to 1870 when the issue increased from about three thousand to about seven thousand annually. The census tables show a corresponding increase in our manufactured products. They rose from $1,000,000,000 in 1850 to $1,800,000,000 in 1860, and to $4,200,000,000 in 1870. The growth of manufactures, too, in different sections of our country has uniformly been attended by an increase of patents taken out in those localities. For a long time New England took out more than any other six States excluding New York. New York has long stood first, and Pennsylvania now stands next. But in 1870 the six great Western agricultural States, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Missouri took out more patents than all New England—2,915 against 2,757. In 1877 Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois received 2,579 patents against 2,479 received by New England. For the ten months ending November 1, 1878, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois received 1,961 patents, while New England received only 1,958. Texas, Georgia, and Tennessee during those ten months received 288 against 277 issued to Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont with their varied manufactures. The number granted to the Southern States rapidly increased with the growth of their manufacturing industries.

We have been accustomed to regard ours as almost exclusively an agricultural nation, and a certain school of American statesmen have contended that we should confine ourselves to the raising of raw materials and rely upon the cheap labor of other lands for manufactured goods. This theory crops out, if I am not mistaken, in some legislation now pending. It is doubtless true that we are now able to control the agricultural markets of the world. But we are able to do so only by the aid of patented machinery created and constantly improved by the influence of our patent system. Were it not for this advantage the cheaper labor of Russia would give to her an easy victory over our western prairies.

Yet it is no less true that we are rapidly becoming a great manufacturing nation. Even in 1870 our manufactured products surpassed in value those of our agriculture, the former amounting to $4,232,325,000, the latter to $2,447,538,000. The wages of farm laborers, including board, then amounted to $310,286,285, while the wages of manufacturing operatives amounted to $775,564,343. Between 1850 and 1870 our population increased only about 65 per cent., while the product of our manufacturing industries increased nearly 322 per cent. In 1870 the agricultural industry of the seven great agricultural States of the West, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, produced $861,000,000, while their manufactures produced $937,000,000.

Our commercial statistics tell the same story. For the ten years ending in 1830 our average annual export of the product of our manufacturing industry amounted only to $6,550,000 out of a total export of $53,221,241, while for the ten years ending in 1850 they were $15,750,000 out of a total of $112,000,000. But in 1877 the exports due to our manufacturing industry were $152,000,000 out of a total of $632,000,000, and in 1878 the proportion was yet greater.

The same statistics show that our imports of manufactured goods are steadily diminishing. Between 1875 and 1878 they fell much more than $100,000,000.

I do not include in these estimates breadstuffs nor dressed lumber among manufactured articles, though neither could be exported without the aid of many patented inventions.

Look for a moment at the statistics of the commerce of England and France, our chief manufacturing rivals. The amount of articles other than raw materials and food imported into England advanced from $269,147,000 in 1875 to $284,710,000 in 1877, while her exports of such articles fell from $353,177,000 in 1875 to $296,394,000 in 1877.

The imports of such articles into France increased from $316,613,000 in 1875 to $349,839,000 in 1877, while during the same period her exports of them fell from $362,489,000 to $320,954,000.

Thus we see that England imported $15,563,000 more and exported $59,753,000 less in 1877 than she did in 1875, making a difference against her of $75,346,000.

France imported $33,226,000 more and exported $41,535,000 less in 1877 than in 1875, a difference of $74,761,000 against her manufacturing industries.

During the same period that our great rivals in manufacturing lost more than $150,000,000 we gained more than $120,000,000. The next census will show, I believe, yet more astonishing progress on our part.

The excess of our imports over our exports in 1875 was $19,500,000. But in 1876 our exports exceeded our imports $79,643,81; in 1877 $151,152,094, and in 1878, $257,814,234. At the end of the present fiscal year the balance of trade in our favor must be yet greater.

These figures tell eloquently the great story of our national progress. Fresh from studying them Gladstone recently declared that we alone "could and probably would at a coming time wrest from England her commercial primacy."

Now, sir, let me ask the Senate to consider how much of our marvelous progress, how many of our gigantic triumphs over nature, how great a share of the wonderful development of our almost limitless resources is due to the aid of inventions whose very existence came from patent laws. Without patented inventions our vast crops could neither be planted, nor raised, nor gathered, nor marketed. Our mineral treasures would sleep secure in their beds of adamantine rock; our petroleum instead of illuminating the civilized world would remain hidden in its subterranean caverns; our vast and infinitely varied manufacturing industries could never have existed.

But, sir, we are told that the increase of labor-saving machinery has induced overproduction and deprived our workmen of labor. Yet it is an undeniable fact that in countries where labor is done by machinery its wages are much higher than in those countries where it is not. We are pre-eminently a machinery-using nation, but nowhere else does labor command so high a price. Mr. Edward Dubied, an eminent Swiss manufacturer, upon his return home from the Philadelphia exposition of 1876, published a pamphlet upon our manufactures, in which he says:

At this rate there is no reason why all our industries should not be overwhelmed, one after another, by those of America; and yet when we ask what wages are paid the workmen in the latter country we learn with surprise that they are three times as much as those which our workmen, both artisans and farm-hands, receive.

From this it would appear that under a good patent system, such as ours is acknowledged to be, workmen receive higher wages than they do where no such system or a less popular one exists.

The reason is obvious. Manufacturing cannot now be prosecuted to any extent without machinery. Those who deplore this cannot deny it. That country which has the best machinery can manufacture most cheaply, and can, therefore, undersell and ruin competitors, other things being equal; consequently it can afford to pay high wages to its operatives. A patent system like ours encourages and creates numerous labor-saving improvements in machinery which are slow to go into countries where a less popular system or none exists. Our manufacturers, therefore, keep always a few years in advance of their foreign rivals in the use of such improvements. It is not generally known how constantly and rapidly machinery is improved in this country by inventions which individually appear insignificant, but which aggregated produce great results. The efficiency of cotton-manufacturing machinery has thus been so much increased that no manufacturer could now afford to accept as a gift and use the best machinery of fifteen years ago. The same thing is true of many other kinds of machinery. These inventions are generally made by workmen who are stimulated to it by the cheapness with which patents can be secured here, and who, under the laws of England and France, would be unable to secure patents or to derive sufficient profit from them to warrant the outlay necessary to obtain them; besides, the encouragement which our patent system gives to workmen and their familiarity with inventions vastly increase their efficiency.

If, then, that system is crippled or destroyed our manufacturers must still use machinery. But improvements in it will cease to be made, or if made they will be kept secret. The result will inevitably be that countries having patent laws will soon gain over us the advantages we now have over them. Our manufacturers will be compelled to reduce the wages of their operatives to compete with foreigners even in our own markets, and to abandon the hope of finding markets abroad. Our agricultural machinery will cease to be improved; it will in a few years be adopted by other countries, and the western farmer will be compelled to contend with the cheap labor of Russia, wielding our mechanical weapons. No more fatal, peaceful blow could be aimed at our national greatness.

I firmly believe, Mr. President, that our labor-saving inventions do not permanently deprive our workmen of labor. Were they not made our manufacturers would be ruined by foreign competition and their operatives driven to the raising of raw materials, and thus kept in a state of ignominious and badly paid vassalage to foreign countries, where alone they could find markets. But labor-saving machines not only cheapen the product and thereby increase consumption, but furnish new markets abroad and thus immensely enhance the amount of work to be done. The operatives whose labor has been temporarily superseded by machinery are thus soon employed in running and in making such machinery.

Why, sir, when we look around us we see the mechanical industry of this country almost wholly employed in making and using the inventions which have been made within the last half century.

It is sometimes urged that if our patent system were abolished we should get the inventions of other nations free of cost. But, sir, we should then get them too late, if at all. They would first go into use abroad, and thus we should always be at a disadvantage. Other nations have tried that experiment and have repented of it. Bismarck advocated it less than a dozen years ago, but Prussia has to-day a patent law based upon our own. Switzerland and Canada believed in it till recently, but to-day confess their error and have either followed or are about to follow our own example. They have found that without the protection of a patent law their people will either not invent at all or keep their inventions secret or carry them to countries where they can have such protection. They have found their own manufacturers unwilling to adopt foreign inventions without protection against rivals who incur neither the expense of the trial nor the risk of failure.

Had the secrets of nature and the potentiality of mechanical forces been fully discovered and revealed it might be expedient to abolish all patent systems. But such is by no means the case. As the ever-widening circle of invention grows it opens new and broader realms to discovery and conquest. The mysteries and powers of nature seem limitless like the universe and countless like the stars which sweep through it in endless procession. We are assured that the lightning which but lately was tamed into carrying our messages will soon be compelled to light our dwellings, and it is hinted that it may soon be harnessed to the yoke in the place of steam. Eager minds are dreaming of the stupendous problem of decomposing water into its inflammable elements, and thus making it supply light, heat, and motive power to the world. Never before was the genius of invention so eager, so well equipped, or so powerful; never before had it so fair a prospect for winning startling and magnificent triumphs. It has ample room for effort in the further development of old and long-used discoveries. Take the steam-engine for example, the swart genie whom our civilization has converted into its most useful servant: its powers, gigantic as they are, are as yet mainly undeveloped. In the Cornish mines in the fifteenth year of the present century an engine could lift only twenty million pounds of water one foot for a bushel of coal. Five and thirty years after, in 1850, its powers had been developed threefold.

Since 1850 improvements have constantly been made, yet even now reliable estimates show that the best engine wastes nine-tenths of the power contained in the fuel which it burns. What a vast field for invention is afforded by this single machine. A monopoly of one-ninth of that wasted energy would give to any individual wealth beyond the wildest dreams of avarice and to any nation supremacy greater than any ever won by conquest. No daring inventor need sigh for new worlds to conquer. There is a realm before him wider, richer, and more magnificent than that over which flew the eagles of Macedon or Rome. His conquests once made will be more enduring, more civilizing, more beneficent than any ever won in the pomp and glitter of war or by the subtlest schemes of cold diplomacy. England was given greater power by the inventor of the steam-engine than by all her warriors from Caractacus to General Roberts.

Let me remind the Senate, too, that even during the life of a patent, when in terms the inventor has the exclusive right to its use, the public has nearly all the benefit of it. Statistics conclusively show that the inventor or his representatives rarely if ever obtain as royalty or otherwise more than one-tenth of the value of any invention during that period, and generally much less. The rest goes to the people in the cheapening of manufactured commodities. Some striking illustrations of this fact have been shown your committee in the hearings upon this bill.

The Senator from Minnesota offered a resolution the other day instructing your committee to inquire into the expediency of substituting for the patent laws the system of granting to inventors, by act of Congress or otherwise, specific rewards based upon the value of the invention and the labor and skill required to perfect it.

To this and all similar propositions there are objections which to me seem insurmountable. In the first place, such a plan is unconstitutional. Congress has no power over the subject except "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries."

How under this provision can Congress secure or grant to inventors anything but the exclusive right to their inventions? If Congress chooses to execute the power, it can do so only in the manner the Constitution prescribes. The grant of a pecuniary reward, or of a qualified right, or of anything more or less than an exclusive right for a limited time, seems to me unauthorized. Under such a system of rewards, when should they be granted? If before the invention went into use, its value would be uncertain, and receiving the reward would so chill the interest of the inventor that his invention would seldom if ever get into use. The British Parliament once attempted to grant such rewards, and the greatest one fell to the inventor of a pretended dyspepsia cure which was never afterward heard of.

I share to some extent the feeling expressed by the Senator from Michigan as to the trivial character of many patented inventions, but think it dangerous to apply the remedy for it which he suggests. The plain truth is that no Commissioner should exercise a power of rejection so undefined and so liable to abuse. I cannot forget that the steamboat, the locomotive, the electric telegraph, nay, even the steam-engine itself, were in their infancy the objects of much ridicule, and that many very worthy and learned men would have refused them the letters-patent without which they never could have been perfected.

Only a few years ago the learned Senator might have ridiculed the machinery for hatching fishes' eggs more keenly than he now does that for hatching the eggs of fowls, yet the former discovery is now universally recognized as of immense importance. Newcomen's engine was long regarded as a scientific toy, yet it was the germ of Watts's. I am disposed to look with some patience upon inventions relating to toys and articles of dress when I remember how much they have contributed to the wealth of Germany, Switzerland, and France. I console myself with the thought that the science of chemistry owes its origin to the foolish search of alchemists for the philosopher's stone and the elixir of life, and that even the manufacture of patent hoop-skirts, which we all doubtless consider a frivolous nuisance, led to valuable discoveries in the nature of steel. Trivial inventions pay to the Government more than they cost it, and do little, if any, harm. If they are worthless, the eleventh section of this bill will soon sweep them out of existence.

I now ask the attention of the Senate to the several sections of the bill.

The first section of the bill establishes the period of limitation in patent causes at four years.

There is now no statute of limitations applicable to patent causes, unless it be the act of July 8, 1870, which creates no bar from lapse of time till six years after the expiration of the patent, and which was omitted from the Revised Statutes. The present state of the law encourages patentees to sleep upon their rights for many years till their inventions have gone into general use and become interwoven with large business interests, and then to extort large sums from innocent infringers. This section will prevent such a practice and yet give the patentee time enough to carry one test case to judgment in the circuit court, at least, before embarking in extensive litigation to preserve his rights. It also provides that while one suit is being prosecuted in good faith and with reasonable diligence, proceedings in other pending cases involving the same issues may be staid by any court in which they may be pending. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois, adopted in the Committee of the Whole, seems to me to be unnecessary and inoperative, and I shall ask a vote upon it in the Senate. The cases for which it provides seem to me to be provided for in the bill.

The second section of the bill relates to damages and profits in suits for infringement and evokes more conflict of opinion than any other. Under the existing law (Revised Statutes, section 4919) a patentee may recover against an infringer in a suit at law "actual damages," and these are "to compensate him for the injury sustained by the unlawful violation of the exclusive right secured to him by the patent," (Birdsall vs. Cooledge, 93 U. S., 68.) Of this rule there is no complaint and the bill does not change it. The bill makes this rule as to the measure of damages applicable to suits in equity as well as to suits at law and authorizes the court to apply it. Damages, technically so called, are not recoverable in suits in equity except by force of some statute. But courts of equity have jurisdiction of trusts and have allowed the patentee to treat the infringer as his trustee holding his invention in trust. Upon this theory of a trust the infringer is held liable in equity to account to the patentee for all the profits derived from his unlawful use of the invention. In deciding what were profits for which the infringer must account the courts have adopted rules which sometimes work grievous injustice upon innocent infringers, which are not necessary for the protection of the patentee, and which often can be administered only with extreme difficulty.

In the recent case of Mowry vs. Whitney (14 Wall., 621) it was held that the "profits" consisted in the gain in advantage or in economy between the old method or machine open to the defendant and the new and improved machine invented by the patentee. This definition wrought no great injustice in that case, because the defendant had made actual profits from the infringement.

But afterward, in the case of Mevs vs. Conover, (11 Pat. Off. Gaz., 1111,) where the infringement had cheapened the manufacture, though it resulted in a loss, the Supreme Court held the defendant liable for the amount he had saved by the infringement, though the article made by the patented machine could not be sold for what it cost.

In similar cases the same rule has since been laid down by other courts. This rule compels an infringer who may be innocent of intentional wrong to account as trustee for imaginary profits which he never realized and which he could not possibly have realized.

This rule erroneously assumes that the "profits" from the use of a patented invention equal the saving it effects in the cost of production. Practically such is never the case. The use of a patented labor-saving invention lessens the cost of the product, but at once diminishes its selling price, so that the consumer, and not the manufacturer, gets the lion's share of the advantage. The experience of many years has shown that at least 90 per cent. of such saving in the cost of manufacture goes to the consumer. This rule, therefore, compels an innocent infringer, through a legal fiction, to account for profits at least nine times as large as his actual profits could possibly have been.

This rule has led to decrees giving almost fabulous sums for the use of worthless inventions and has wrought great injustice. The Supreme Court signified, in the case of Packet Company vs. Sickles, (19 Wall., 611,) its strong dissatisfaction with the operation of the rule, but subsequent cases have shown that it cannot break away from the precedents it has made. Legislation alone can do away with the rule, and the second section does it.

Courts of equity have also found it extremely difficult, if not absolutely impossible, to arrive by any process of accounting at the profits derived from a patented invention which is merely used in carrying on any business. For instance, how can any one determine the profits derived by a farmer from the use of a patented corn-planter? His profits depend upon his crop, and that depends upon the fertility of his soil, his skill, his care, the weather, the use of perhaps a score of other patented inventions and a score of accidents. It will not do to charge him with savings as profits because the general use of the corn-planter has so cheapened the product that he would not have undertaken to plant corn without it, and such savings might sometimes exceed the market value of the crop. It is absolutely impossible to ascertain his actual profits from the use of that invention. The same is true of every case where a patented invention is merely used in a business. It is especially true where the invention effects no pecuniary saving, but only produces increased comfort or safety, as in the case of a ventilator, railroad-brake, or an electrical fire-alarm. Now, this section says that in all such cases the courts shall not attempt to do what it is impossible for them to do and what they are bound to do only by a fiction of law.

It does away with the rule which requires the defendant to account for savings as profits, or for imaginary profits where he has made none, or to account for profits where it is impossible to determine what share of them is due to the use of the patented invention. In all such cases the courts must decide what sum the infringer must pay as a license fee for the actual use he has made of the invention. In arriving at that amount they are bound to consider the utility and advantage of the invention (including, of course, any saving it may have made in the cost of production) and all the material circumstances of the case. This section thus secures to the inventor in all such cases full and adequate compensation for any injury he may have suffered from the unauthorized use of his invention. It leaves to him unimpaired the sovereign remedy of an injunction. It protects all his rights so fully and completely that he has no just ground of complaint.

Where the defendant has made an actual profit from making for sale or selling the thing patented, or the product of it, there is much less difficulty in ascertaining the profits, and in such cases the bill leaves to the patentee the right to demand an account. It enlarges his remedy by providing for the appointment of an auditor to take such account in actions at law. If the profits do not equal the amount of a reasonable license fee, it allows the plaintiff to recover the difference.

This section repeals the allowance of treble damages but authorizes the court where the suit or defense is vexatious and malicious, or the infringement willful, to allow against the defeated party a just and reasonable sum as counsel fees and expenses of suit. The amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama allows the court in such cases to allow such just and reasonable sum, not only against the defeated but against the successful party. I am heartily in favor of that amendment. It will prevent the unnecessary multiplication of suits and accumulation of cost against innocent infringers, and will furnish to the worthy constituents of my friend the Senator from Minnesota protection against the oppressive and vexatious litigation they fear.

I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to this section. It allows an account to be taken of savings as profits when they are never justly such; it authorizes an account for merely imaginary profits, and an account for profits when no human ingenuity can tell what they are. It authorizes the court taking an account of these so-called profits, which is one of the most expensive and troublesome proceedings known to the law, to allow the plaintiff just what sum it may deem reasonable. It really leaves the question of damages in all cases to the discretion of the court, and allows the court to consider as evidence facts which should have no weight in the case. I am opposed to intrusting any court with such vast and undefined powers, however pure and learned it may be.

The third section of the bill gives the circuit courts power to allow appeals to determine the questions of validity and infringement before putting the parties to the delay and expense of an accounting which will be useless if its decision is reversed. I see no objection to the amendment to this section offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The fourth section enables the circuit courts, subject to the direction of the Supreme Court, to exercise control over the parties by injunction pending an appeal.

The fifth section supersedes section 4916 of the Revised Statutes, and relates to reissues. It changes the existing law in several respects.

First. Upon an application for the reissue of a patent it allows no evidence of what the intention is except such as is afforded by the papers filed in the office before the original patent issued, whereas the present law allows evidence beyond the record by ex parte affidavits.

Secondly. It does not allow the model to be resorted to at all as evidence for the reissue.

Thirdly. It makes it the duty of the court to inquire in suits on a reissued patent whether it is for anything except the same invention shown, contained, or substantially indicated in the specification or drawings of the original application and its amendments, and which the patentee would have been entitled to include as a part of his invention in the patent originally granted.

Fourthly. It forbids the granting of a reissue unless the same is applied for within seven years from the date of the original patent or within four years from the date of the passage of this act.

I hope and believe that the provisions of this section will be sufficient to prevent the frauds which have heretofore often been accomplished by means of reissues, and which have brought discredit on the patent system.

The sixth section provides that reissues shall not have a retroactive effect against any machine or other article made before their date.

The seventh section merely authorizes the correction of mistakes made in issuing patents to more or fewer persons than were entitled to receive them, with the consent of all the owners.

The eighth section authorizes the taking of testimony in perpetuam in patent causes, for which there is now no adequate provision.

The ninth section allows suit to be brought by special leave of the court to repeal and annul void patents.

The tenth section gives a remedy for cases where a person injures the business of another by setting up a claim that it infringes his patent and yet refuses to bring a suit to try its validity or the question of infringement.

The eleventh section requires the payment of a fee of $50 when the patent is about four and one-half years old, and another of $100 when the patent is about nine and one-half years old. This section is in the interest of inventors as well as of the public, and will annul the abandoned and worthless patents which obstruct valuable inventions, and which reappear in reissues and otherwise only for purposes of annoyance and oppression. This plan has been tried in other countries and proved beneficial.

The twelfth section requires exclusive licenses to be recorded like technical grants, because the two are identical. It shortens the time allowed for recording assignments from three months to one month, a change justified by improvements in the mail service since 1836. It also allows all agreements relating to patents to be recorded, and makes certified copies from the record legal evidence.

The thirteenth section gives effect to an agreement between joint owners of a patent as to which shall grant licenses when the same is in writing and recorded.

The fourteenth section punishes by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by fine of $1,000, frauds perpetrated in the sale of patent rights which are not punishable at common law nor by the usual State criminal laws against fraud.

The fifteenth section requires the assistant commissioner of patents to give the same bond as the Commissioner.

The sixteenth section establishes the price for Patent-Office copies, in no case to be less than the actual cost, and the maximum price to be the same that it now is.

The seventeenth section authorizes the use of certified copies of models as evidence.

The first sentence of the eighteenth section conforms to the existing law, the second merely relates to a matter of convenience in the Patent Office, and the proviso enacts that an inventor who has done all that the law requires shall not suffer by the delay of the office.

The nineteenth section provides that if an inventor publishes his invention by patenting it abroad he must apply for a patent here within two years, if at all. The present law provides that if the inventor procures a patent abroad his patent here shall expire as soon as his foreign patent; but if he allows foreigners to use it without restriction he shall have the whole seventeen years here. This unjust discrimination against American patentees is abolished.

The twentieth section provides that applications for reissues may be signed and sworn to by the owner of the patent or his legal representatives.

The twenty-first section corrects a palpable oversight in the present law, by merely inserting the words "in order to be a continuance of the original application."

The twenty-second section provides that for the convenience of the Patent Office the patentee shall mark the number of his patent upon the patented article.

The twenty-third section amends section 4904 of the Revised Statutes so as to include applications for reissue and make them conform to the decisions.

I refrain from discussing the power of Congress to make the provisions of the second section of the bill applicable to existing causes of action and pending suits. That power has not been questioned in this debate. That section leaves to patentees just and ample remedies, which is all they are entitled to. Your committee has long and carefully considered this bill. Before them, in numerous hearings, have appeared many of the ablest patent lawyers in the land, representing all classes of persons interested in patents, the officials of the Patent Office, and many prominent patentees, who have discussed every feature of the bill and furnished a vast array of facts bearing upon the whole subject. For nearly two years the subject has been before your committee. Entering upon its consideration with different and conflicting views, they have, after exhaustive deliberation and discussion, unanimously arrived at the conclusion that the bill, if it passes, will have a good effect and promote the best interest of patentees and of the people.

The able discussions to which it has given rise have clearly shown the enormous influence our patent laws have had and still have upon our national progress and prosperity. Doubtless they have sometimes been used for the purposes of oppression; and what laws have not? I can find no terms sufficiently strong to express my condemnation of the chicanery which has aroused the indignation of the Senator from Minnesota. I trust the worthy citizens of the West whose wrongs he has so eloquently portrayed will seek and obtain justice from their legal tribunals. I feel sure that this bill, if it passes, will relieve the people from vexatious and malicious prosecutions and remove all just cause of complaint they have against our patent laws.

I am confident also that the provisions of this bill will, if they pass into law, strengthen our patent system. Its importance to our people justly demands for it the fostering care of Congress. Now, when our foreign rivals recognize in it the secret of our success, is not the time to treat it with indifference, much less with hostility. The inventive genius of our people, stimulated by our patent laws, is our chief reliance for success in the great conflict going on between the nations of the earth for industrial and commercial primacy, in which our opponents have the advantage of cheap labor. Encouraged and protected by wise legislation, that inventive genius will win yet greater victories over nature and place our country first and foremost among nations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MCMILLAN in the chair.) The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

The amendment was read.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, owing, no doubt chiefly, to the unusual occasion that the Senate has been invited to attend, it is obvious that the Senate is very thin; and so, without an expectation of a vote upon this bill to-day, I presume the chairman of the committee does not care about proceeding with it. The hour is very near when the Senate has agreed to go to the House; and therefore, unless I interfere with the wish of some Senator, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. We ought not to adjourn; we go in a body to the other House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will permit the Chair to say that the Speaker of the House has just called at his room, and desired that Senators should be in the Hall of the House of Representatives at five minutes before three o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Does not the Senate go to the House in a body?

Mr. CONKLING. Let me withhold my motion to adjourn for a moment to hear what the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] desires to say.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have been seeking the floor to say that I heard a Senator state a few moments ago that he would like to have an executive session of a few minutes. I know he is in the neighborhood of the Hall. I move, therefore, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONKLING. I withdraw my motion for that.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I submit my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, (at two o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the Senate took a recess until two o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.

The Senate reassembled at two o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the resolution of the Senate provided that the Senate should proceed at three o'clock to the Hall of the House. I understand that it is desirable that the Senators should be seated there by three o'clock. I move, therefore, that the Senate now proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives, headed by the Vice-President and Secretary, and preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Senate returned to its Chamber at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m., and the Vice-President resumed the chair.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senator to withdraw that and let me submit another motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn to Monday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

At five minutes to three o'clock p. m. the House reassembled.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That, pursuant to the invitation of the House of Representatives, the Senate will attend the funeral ceremony of Hon. JULIAN HARTRIDGE, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Georgia, in the Hall of the House of Representatives this day at three o'clock.

FUNERAL SERVICES OVER REMAINS OF MR. HARTRIDGE.

At three o'clock the Senate of the United States, preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms and headed by the Vice-President of the United States, with the Secretary, the Chief-Justice and associate justices of the Supreme Court, and the President of the United States and the members of his Cabinet, entered the Hall, were properly announced, and were then conducted to the seats assigned them.

At fifteen minutes past three o'clock the casket containing the remains was brought into the Hall, preceded by the Chaplain of the House, the committee of arrangements, and the Senators and Representatives from Georgia.

The Chaplain of the House, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D., read the ninetieth psalm and selections from the Gospel according to Saint John, the book of Job, and the first epistle of Timothy. He then offered the following prayer:

Almighty God our Heavenly Father, we are assembled together this day on a solemn occasion. It has pleased Thee in Thy mysterious providence to call from earth into eternity one whom we loved, a member of this House of Representatives, one of the chosen servants of this people. We can but bow, O God, in submission to this affliction of Thy providence, and we pray Thee that while we consider this day the death of our departed friend, oh impress upon us the solemn truth that we too are mortal, that we are passing away, that very soon the place that knows us now will know us here no more forever.

O Infinite Spirit, apply the lesson of this hour to every heart. O God, help us to reverence Thy name and Thy law and to fear Thee as the beginning of wisdom, to give Thee our heart-service, to dedicate our lives to Thy glory upon the earth, that we may fulfill every duty, that with fidelity in all things we may honor Thy name and serve our generation.

O God, look in pity, in tender compassion, upon the family of this deceased brother. O Thou that hast promised to be a husband to the widow and a father to the fatherless, care tenderly for them. Do Thou soften this heavy stroke by the consolations of Thy Holy Spirit; and as no man can minister to grief so deep and so dark, O Infinite God, do Thou give solace, and in Thy compassion and Thy tender mercy may they find resignation and peace.

Go with us, O God, to the remainder of our life's short journey, prepare us for every duty to Thee, to our country, to ourselves. May we be faithful to all trusts; may we serve Thee with a perfect heart; and when we too shall lie cold in death, when we shall appear in the presence of our Infinite Judge, O God, grant unto us in the parting hour confidence in Thy mercy, trust in Thy redeeming power, and in the heaven of everlasting peace receive us all at last, through Jesus Christ our Redeemer. Amen.

The Chaplain next read selections from the fifteenth chapter of the first epistle of Saint Paul to the Corinthians, and afterward addressed the House as follows:

All that is mortal, my beloved hearers, of JULIAN HARTRIDGE, Representative in the Congress of the United States from the State of Georgia, lies before us. Suddenly, in a day, without warning, cut down as by a single stroke of the great reaper, Death. In the prime of life and vigor of his days his sun has gone down while it was yet high noon.

It is not my purpose to speak of him as a man, as a friend, and a public servant. This task belongs to other and more capable friends. Only those who knew him intimately, who knew him well in all the closer relations of private friendship, were fully prepared to appreciate his worth.

It may be permitted to me to echo what I believe to be the general sentiment of esteem in which he was held by all who knew him. As a man, frank in disposition, courteous in manner, generous in spirit, brave in principle, true to every trust reposed in him. As a man, modest, retiring, somewhat reticent, and therefore needed to be thoroughly and closely cultivated in order to be fully understood and appreciated. As a public servant, trusted in early life with the responsibilities of a high station among his fellow-citizens, repeatedly the subject of their choice in various public stations in his own State, and for nearly four years in this House a Representative of his people. Everywhere that he was known, by all with whom he came in contact, I believe it to be simply true to say that he was thoroughly esteemed and fondly loved as a friend, as a man.

His mind was clear and logical, having the peculiar characteristics which qualified him for the thorough mastery of the science of the law. His life devoted to this profession, preferred by him above all others, it was but recently that he refused to be a candidate for renomination to the office which he had filled in this Government, preferring the private duties, the labors and toils and the promises of his own profession to public life.

A rapidly extending practice, a rapidly growing interest called his attention home; and so he was awaiting but the lapse of the few weeks that remain of this present Congress to retire to his native place and give himself wholly to the duties of the legal profession.

Alas, how frail are human expectations! How suddenly are our hopes blasted! Oh, how vain are the calculations of man trusting to a long life, to a prosperous and useful future! In a moment cut down and he himself summoned to the bar of his Judge!

While I leave to others to portray his character, as a minister of the everlasting gospel of the Son of God it becomes my duty to press upon your attention the solemn lesson of this hour. As he lies cold in the coffin to-day, you and I, my hearers, must lie before many days have passed away. It is but a trite statement of the truth, and it is one that we have avoided and have endeavored to put away from thought and conscience; but death is a certainty. Whatever else may happen to you and to me, we must die. If you or I were able to gather together all the wealth of the world we could not postpone, much less prevent, that solemn hour. Whatever station you may occupy in society, you may illustrate the glory of your country, you may write your names high upon the temple of fame, the world may be filled with the testimonials of its applause at your achievements, but though you stand in fame's highest niche, out of that you must come down and fill the narrow house of clay. The warrior may grasp all the world as the prize of his skill on the battle-field, and while the wreath is being placed upon his brow the insidious archer, Death, shall strike his vitals with the poisoned arrow, and the wreath of fame will be transferred from the throbbing brow to the pale memory of a man that was.

However we may fulfill, however we may dignify, the trusts committed to our hands, faithful or unfaithful, true or untrue to them, in any event, in every event, this, among all uncertainties of time, this is certain—that we must die. Let us not put away the consideration of this thought because it is appalling, because it brings to the conscience and to the heart a tremor and a fear that is dreadful. We must consider it; it is wisdom to think of it; it is the highest wisdom to prepare for it and so to live as that whenever death may come we shall be prepared to answer the summons.

You, my fellow-countrymen, you who are representatives of this great people, having responsibilities intrusted to you as broad as the mighty land you serve, you are in an especial sense the ministers of the great God, the ruler of nations and of men. Your public trusts will be judged by those who committed them to your care, and before that bar of judgment you periodically stand; but the accountability to the Judge of all men, to our Creator, our Preserver, our Redeemer, that is immediate; it is direct; it is unavoidable.

I have no right to enter into the secret councils of any man's thought, nor can I come between him and the Infinite Father. But to-day I solemnly exhort you. Oh, to-day I dare ask you this momentous inquiry: Are you, as representative men of this nation, by precept and example giving forth to those you represent, to the people whom you serve, such testimonies of moral rectitude and purity and goodness as they ought to follow, that following you they may glorify God and serve their generation? The very uncertainty of the time of death is often an excuse for our postponing its consideration. We must die; that is certain. We do not know when we shall die; the hour is uncertain. It may be in a month, a week, a day, an hour hence that our God shall call us to answer for the trusts reposed in our hands. Oh, to-day may the Infinite Spirit seal the solemn lesson thrice repeated within twenty days to the members of this House and of this Congress. Oh, to-day may the Infinite Spirit seal this lesson upon our hearts, and may we serving our country as fulfilling a duty to God himself, so serve God in all our actions, private and public, as that He may be pleased to own our labors, with gracious benediction to bless us, and make us the examples that others may follow in safety; and when these days of ours are numbered and our short life is passed away, oh that you, my hearers, that we all may pass out of the darkness, out of the clouds, out of the uncertainties, out of the doubts, out of the mysteries of this brief life into the eternal day of peace and rest at God's right hand.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate, then offered the following prayer:

O God, Most High, King Eternal, Immortal, Invisible, suffer us not in any blindness of nature, in any severity of trouble to doubt of Thy fatherhood. Suffer us not in any pride of reason or vanity of conceit to despise Thy chastening and set at naught Thy reproof. Though we are all as men of unclean lips before Thee, yet is there not in the wide universe any friend for us like Thee. There is none like Thee to love us. Though we cannot resolve the mystery of our complication with the evil of the world, yet in our struggle to be free we would fain put all our trust in Thee as our all-sufficient help.

O God, remember the days of our mourning and out of our darkness create Thou for us the light of immortal hope. Let not the failures of this life nor even the deliquium of death itself prostrate us and cast us down with dismay, since Thou hast opened for us the portals of eternity and made even the grave itself but the gateway to a realm of everlasting honor and renown.

Be graciously pleased to comfort those that weep for the father and friend who lies low in this hall. In this deep gloom who can embrace them but Thee? Be with Thy servants who shall go to bear him away out of the great station from which Thou hast so suddenly summoned him to his distant home, where the light of earth is gone out forever. Send Thine angels to whisper to the widow's heart and stricken children that solace which can come alone from Thee. O Lord of Grace, keep them in Thy peace. And now, we beseech Thee, be favorable to Thy servants, the President of the United States and to all our public rulers, counselors, law-givers, magistrates, judges, governors, officers, and all the inhabitants of the land, that righteousness and truth may be the stability of our times, and that we may be a people to Thy praise, in all our generation, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The benediction having been pronounced by the Chaplain of the House, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, the remains of the deceased were then removed from the Hall, followed by the Georgia delegation and the committee of arrangements, to be conveyed to his late residence at Savannah, Georgia, and the President of the United States, the members of the Cabinet, the Chief-Justice and associate justices of the Supreme Court, and the members of the Senate retired from the Hall.

On motion of Mr. COLE, (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 10, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of December 9, 1878, a statement of amounts and rates paid by disbursing officers of the Quartermaster's Department to the Oregon Steam-Navigation Company for Government transportation and hire of steamboats on the Columbia River and its tributaries; which, on motion of Mr. MITCHELL, was referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, presented the petition of Thomas J. Bigford and others, of Illinois, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of wholesale grocers and dealers in sugar, of Chicago, Illinois, remonstrating against the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury that high-grade and low-grade sugars be admitted at a one-rate duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MATTHEWS presented the petition of M. J. Campbell and others, citizens of Montgomery County, Ohio, praying for the prompt passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KERNAN. I present four memorials of different parties, similar in character, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 1330) to quiet title of settlers on Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes. These memorials are from people in New York State and some in Massachusetts. The bill having been reported, I move that the memorials lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN presented a memorial of Williams & Guion and others, merchants and ship-owners, in favor of the passage of House bill No. 3547, to regulate interstate commerce and prevent unjust discrimination by common carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Dr. Mary E. Walker, late acting assistant surgeon United States Army, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KERNAN. I have received a resolution passed by the senate of the State of New York. It is short, and I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported at length.

The resolution was read, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
In Senate, Albany, January 7, 1879.

Whereas the "Army reorganization bill" now before Congress proposes to prohibit the future manufacture of ordnance and ordnance stores at United States arsenals; to sell all the arsenals, which thus become unnecessary, and hereafter to purchase ordnance and ammunition from private manufacturers only: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress be requested to oppose the passage of said bill, or at least the portions relating to the Ordnance department, United States arsenals, and ordnance stores.

By order:

JOHN W. VROOMAN, Clerk.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ARMSTRONG presented the petition of O. P. Riley and others, citizens of Plattsburgh, Missouri, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of Levi L. Fancher and 77 others, of Tennessee, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. The Public Health Association of America, at its session in Richmond, Virginia, in November last, adopted a resolution appointing a committee to memorialize Congress for the publication of an index to the medical library. As the memorial is short and upon a subject of general interest, I ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Printing, and read, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

This memorial respectfully showeth that at the recent meeting of the American Public Health Association, held at Richmond, Virginia, November 19 and 22, 1878, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas there has been formed at Washington, under the direction of the Surgeon General, United States Army, one of the most valuable medical and sanitary libraries in the world; and

"Whereas there has been prepared under the same direction the manuscript of an index catalogue of this library, which, if published, would more than double the practical utility of the collection, and would be of the greatest value to all medical men and sanitarians even if the library itself were not in existence: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to urge upon Congress the immediate publication of this catalogue, setting forth that such publication, in the opinion of this association, is one of the most important steps which can be taken by the General Government to promote the interests of sanitary science and aid investigation into the causes and prevention of diseases."

In accordance with the above resolutions, the following committee was appointed: Drs. R. W. Mitchell, Memphis, Tennessee, (chairman;) H. I. Bowditch, Boston, Massachusetts; S. M. Bemiss, New Orleans, Louisiana; Wirt Johnson, Jackson, Mississippi; H. B. Baker, Lansing, Michigan; E. H. James, (secretary.)

We, the undersigned, having been duly appointed to act as the committee referred to in these resolutions, do therefore, in the name of the American Public Health Association, and in behalf of the interests of sanitary science in this and other countries, respectfully but urgently request that you will authorize and direct the publication of the catalogue referred to with the least possible delay. The information which it contains is of very great importance to all classes of people, because it will aid all who are laboring for the promotion of either individual or public health. It is information which cannot otherwise be obtained, and its publication by the Government is a duty the early performance of which will tend greatly to promote the cause of public health and prosperity in this country.

R. W. MITCHELL, M. D., Memphis, Tennessee, (chairman.)
H. I. BOWDITCH, M. D., Boston, Massachusetts.
S. M. BEMISS, M. D., New Orleans, Louisiana.
WIRT JOHNSON, M. D., Jackson, Mississippi.
H. B. BAKER, M. D., Lansing, Michigan, Committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of Eliza J. Hughes; another petition of Catharine M. Brownell; and still another of Lysander Brooks, citizens of the State of New York, praying for pensions. I move their reference to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also a resolution of the senate of the State of New York remonstrating against the passage of the bill to reorganize the Army. Being a resolution of the senate of New York, I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has just been read upon the request of the Senator's colleague.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I do not ask to have this copy read. I was not aware it had been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the memorial of Ira Davenport, a citizen of Steuben County, in the State of New York, protesting, for very well-stated and cogent reasons, against the passage of Senate bill No. 1330, being a bill heretofore reported from the Committee on Public Lands, which bill, according to its title, is to quiet the possession and ownership of a large body of land in the State of Iowa. This memorialist thinks, as others do, that the effect of the bill would be not to quiet the title but to work very manifest and grievous injustice. The bill has been reported, is on the Calendar, and I suppose this memorial ought to lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of B. F. Farmer and others, citizens of Spring Valley, Minnesota, and the petition of P. E. Liddy and others, citizens of Minnesota, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROLLINS presented the petition of Ellis Copeland and others, citizens of Washington, New Hampshire, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the petition of E. J. Cutts and others, citizens of Minnesota, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALLACE presented the petition of Solomon Calehoof and others, citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of May & Somers and others, merchants and ship-owners of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Daniel McGrath, late private in Company H, Twenty-first Infantry, United States Army, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a petition numerously signed by merchants and importers at the port of Portland, Oregon, in which they represent briefly that "the building at present occupied by the customs authorities at that port is so far removed from the business center of the city as to render it very inconvenient and extremely burdensome to those having business transactions with the office;" that from the time that collection district "was first established until within a year or so past the customs office was located on the water front at a point convenient to importers as well as masters of vessels, and was removed to its present location by order of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury from economical motives;" that the "apartments assigned to the customs department in the public building in the city are inadequate to the wants of the public service, there being barely sufficient room for the present limited clerical force. Aside from these objections the Government is obliged to rent additional buildings for bonded warehouse, appraiser's store, and steamboat inspectors' offices at great cost, which buildings are fully three-fourths of a mile from the present customs office." They state that "the close business relations existing between these different customs officers render it absolutely necessary that they should be located in the same building."

They further represent that the large increase of business in the post-office department in that city "has already occasioned a demand for more room; that the money transaction alone has more than doubled, and amounts to fully $1,500,000 annually;" and "should the business in the money-order office alone increase during the next year as it has in the past, the post-office department," in which the present custom-house is located, "will require and demand from the proper authorities the entire ground floor of the present building for the proper transaction of its business."

For all these reasons they respectfully and earnestly memorialize Congress to make an appropriation of a sum sufficient for the construction and equipment of a suitable building at some suitable point on Front street for a custom-house, appraisers' store, United States bonded warehouse, and steamboat inspectors' offices; and as in duty bound they will ever pray. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I call the attention of that committee to it. I have already introduced a bill on this subject, and I hope the matter will receive the attention of the committee.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a petition very largely signed by citizens of Kansas, praying for the prompt passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; and I repeat the notice I have hitherto given, that upon the conclusion of the pending measure I shall ask the attention of the Senate to this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will lie upon the table.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of J. R. Walker and others, citizens of Richland, Missouri; the petition of John E. Jacoby and others, citizens of Warrensburgh, Missouri, and the petition of John Proudfit and others, citizens of Summit, Missouri, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented additional papers in the case of George Heard, assignee of Chester Hebner, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the proper officers of the Interior Department to prepare and issue to him a bounty land warrant in pursuance of act of Congress of 1847 for one hundred and sixty acres of land in lieu of a warrant which was burned in the land office at Clinton, Missouri, in November, 1861; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. Since presenting the former memorials I have received one signed by D. M. K. Johnson, John Stryker, and other neighbors of mine residing at Rome, in the county in which I live, and whom I know very well, protesting against the passage of the bill against the passage of which the remonstrance of Mr. Davenport protested. I am told that a motion is to be made to recommit the bill or to refer it to a committee. I suppose of course the memorials that now lie on the table would go with the bill should it be recommitted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of C. B. Simpson and others, citizens of Vermont, praying that Edwin W. Reed, late of Company E, Eighth Vermont Volunteers, be restored to the pension-rolls; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of M. E. Gates and others, citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Benjamin Reynolds and others, citizens of Monson, Massachusetts, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

LIBRARIAN'S REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print 500 extra copies of the annual report of the Librarian of Congress, to report it without amendment and to recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the annual report of the Librarian of Congress on the Library and the copyright department for the calendar year 1878 be printed, and that 500 extra copies with paper covers, be printed for distribution by the Librarian.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1585) for the relief of such members of the Menomonee tribe of Indians as may desire to become citizens of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1586) relating to writs of execution in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLISON. At the request of my colleague, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] who is absent on public business, I ask leave to introduce a bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1587) to provide for the payment of additional bounty to the soldiers of the Army of the United States during the war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1588) for the relief of Talley & Eaton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAWES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1589) for the relief of the legal representatives of William S. Robinson, late of Malden, Massachusetts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SARGENT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1590) to enable the people of Dakota to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. PLUMB and Mr. DORSEY submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes herein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

WAR CLAIMS OF WEST VIRGINIA.

On motion of Mr. HEREFORD, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. No. 937, and papers relating to the claim of the State of West Virginia for expenses incurred in organizing and equipping troops, &c., and that the claimants have leave to withdraw the same from the files of the Senate.

CHIEFS OF NAVAL BUREAUS.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of enacting that the selection of the chiefs of the Bureaus of Steam Engineering, Provisions and Clothing, and Medicine and Surgery shall be made from officers whose relative rank is not below that of captain.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM subsequently said: I ask permission to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to adjourn over until Monday. I do not ask a vote upon it now, but if we fail to pass the Indian appropriation bill this afternoon I shall ask to have the vote reconsidered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

THEOPHILUS P. CHANDLER.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the notice given by the Senator from West Virginia yesterday, the Chair feels bound to recognize that Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to state that I have been giving notice ever since before the adjournment for the holidays that I desired to submit a few remarks to the Senate. I do not know when the notice of the Senator from West Virginia was given, whether before the holidays or since.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from West Virginia will permit me, I desire to ask the Senate to take up a bill from the Committee on Claims. It is the unanimous report of that committee, and one which I think will occupy no time except the reading of a very brief report. It is very important, with reference to the settlement of some estates, that the bill should be passed at once.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If there is to be no debate upon the bill whatever I will give way, subject to my right to the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I think that the reading of a very brief report is all that is required, if indeed that will be required.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I dislike to insist upon the floor against the wish of a Senator; but I believe it was the rule of the Senate long before I was here, and perhaps before any Senator now present came here, that when a Senator gave notice that he desired to address the Senate on a particular subject the floor was always accorded to him.

Mr. HOAR. I do not question in the least that rule, and if the rule did not exist I should prescribe it as a rule for the government of my own conduct, and certainly should not antagonize the right of the Senator from West Virginia to the floor. I do not propose to do so. I merely inquired of the Senator whether it would be agreeble to him to yield for the passage of the bill to which I referred.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If there is no objection to the bill whatever I shall of course yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I will ask to have the bill read subject to the Senator's right to the floor.

The bill (S. No. 1531) for the relief of Theophilus P. Chandler was read; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It relieves Theophilus P. Chandler, late assistant treasurer of the United States at Boston, from all liability for the acts of Julius F. Hartwell, late disbursing clerk and cashier in his office, in loaning or advancing the moneys or funds of the United States to Mellen, Ward & Company, and from all liability to account for any moneys or funds of the United States which were loaned or advanced by Hartwell to Mellen, Ward & Company, the same having been without the default or negligence of Chandler.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HARBOR OF REFUGE ON PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] has on several occasions given notice that he wished to address the Senate. That being the case, I feel that I ought to give way to him this morning. I will, however, give notice that I shall follow the Senator from Oregon with the remarks that I wish to submit to the Senate, or that I shall ask to be heard on Monday morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On Monday morning at the close of the morning business?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes; but if the speech of the Senator from Oregon does not detain us too long, I may follow him to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am much obliged to the Senator from West Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1451) authorizing the construction of a breakwater and a harbor of refuge on the Pacific coast.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I beg the attention of the Senate while I submit briefly as I may some considerations bearing upon a subject in one sense local to that portion of the country which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, but which in fact concerns the future protection, development, and prosperity of a very large share of the commerce of our common country. Although not a member of the Committee on Commerce, I trust I may be pardoned in striving to attract the serious attention of that very able committee to the subject referred to in the bill now under consideration. I am not unmindful, Mr. President, of the fact that it is a not uncommon occurrence in the history of congressional legislation for members to propose at each session numerous measures looking to the development of their particular section or State, oftentimes, it may be, hoping thereby to win the approbation of their constituents. Conscious of this fact, and desirous, as I frankly confess I am, to merit the good opinion of my constituents by my labors in their behalf, I trust I shall, in the measure now under consideration, be able to convince the Senate that the end sought to be gained in this instance is one that is neither visionary, impracticable, nor in any sense void of merit; but rather one demanding in the name of the commerce of our country respectful and earnest consideration, and early and prompt action. I refer, as the bill states, to the construction of a breakwater and harbor of refuge on the Northern Pacific coast.

The subject is not one, I take it, that should excite either local jealousies or State pride as to point of construction, but one to be viewed in the more enlarged intelligence and comprehensive vision of general commercial advancement and national prosperity. The time was, within the memory of the present generation, when the Great West, extending from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific and from the British dominions to Mexico, was comparatively a wilderness, and when the waters of the Pacific Ocean bordering on these extended shores were undisturbed by the ships of commerce. The inquiring and enterprising spirit of the age, however, has wrought a change. Emigration set its foot thitherward; Territories were organized, States created, society established, cities built, agriculture, mechanic arts, mining, manufactures—all have sprung into existence, and to-day the Pacific slope is in point of wealth, national resources, not to speak of its unquestionable prospective greatness, an empire in itself; while the Pacific Ocean, whose waters beat forever on the golden shores of the far West, are thronged by the ships of all nations and enlivened by the busy commerce of the world. Indeed, as I have before remarked, so rapid has been the transition state of the growth and prosperity of the Pacific coast that a mere statement of the real facts seems to strike eastern ears as the rehearsal of an Arabian tale—a mere product of the imagination. Hence the difficulty in concentrating the public mind and inducing public action in reference to these matters of such vital importance, not only to the Pacific coast but to the country at large.

I appreciate and frankly concede this difficulty in attracting public attention to the crying wants of our commerce upon the Pacific coast is not the result of any disposition upon the part of eastern or southern statesmen to ignore any section of the country, but rather the result of a not surprising failure upon the part of those who have never visited the Pacific slope to note and comprehend the rapidity of the change by which the late frontiers of the West have been transformed into an empire of greatness, of commercial wealth, and political, social, and moral power. It is in vain that the six Senators and seven or eight Representatives of the Pacific coast raise their voices and bend their energies in favor of national legislation in the interest of the commerce of the far West, unless indeed we can engage the attention and secure the influence and support of our eastern and southern friends. To you, therefore, fellow Senators, whose long experience upon this floor makes your influence and power felt and recognized, not alone in the councils of the nation, but throughout the land, I appeal, basing it as I do upon no flimsy fabric woven by the imagination, but upon facts and statistics as irrefragable as truth itself. I ask, in the name of the suffering commerce of the West and in the interest of the real growth and prosperity of our nation, to extend us a helping hand, that the blessings of national legislation in aid of national commerce and for its protection may be extended in equal measure to all States and sections, to all rivers and harbors of our great Republic. Whatever national aid is given to protect and encourage our commerce, whether internal or external, even in the remotest portions of our national heritage, is not lost, but returns in vitalizing influence and power to strengthen the heart and energize our whole national being.

It is a fact no less startling than it is true, when viewed in the light of the rapidly increasing commerce of the eastern portion of the Pacific Ocean, that between San Francisco, California, and the strait of Fuca, a distance of over seven hundred miles of sea-coast, there is not a single harbor that can be entered in safety during a southerly gale.

This statement finds support in more than one report of the United States Engineer Corps and of the Coast Survey. To these I shall attract attention as I proceed. The mere statement of this fact, were I to stop here, it seems to me, taken in connection with what every one of common intelligence must concede in reference to the existing commerce of that coast, should arouse from their slumbers and startle from their lethargy those whose duty it is through congressional legislation to provide for the protection of our commerce. But when I point to the myriad merchant vessels, with their valuable cargoes and freighted treasures of life and property, as I shall do as I proceed, that have, as I have stated heretofore elsewhere, for the past twenty years, year after year, one by one, until the number in vessels, in values, and in human life becomes appalling, mainly for the want of some harbor of refuge, gone down amid storms, as Byron describes it, into that—the subject becomes one of deep interest, demanding serious consideration and prompt action. Before closing, I shall attract attention to the number and character of these disasters.

In considering the question as to the necessity of the construction of an artificial harbor of refuge on the Pacific coast at some point between the two points designated, it is not well to confine ourselves solely to the consideration of the coasting trade or the augmentation of the internal commerce of the Pacific States and Territories, but to examine it in the more comprehensive view as to what relation this portion of our seaboard sustains to the transoceanic and transcontinental commerce of the world. Until the people of this country had extended the area of their civilization and planted its banner on the shores of the Pacific, the commerce of Asia and the islands of the intervening ocean was not attracted toward the then uninviting western shores of the new continent. British statesmanship, then exercising its customary strategic influence and aggressive power in giving direction to and in obtaining control of the commerce of the world, had for centuries and ever since it had grasped the commerce of the East, which from the earliest period of the Christian era had been carried on by land from Western Asia to the shores of the Mediterranean, enriching the cities of Western Asia, Northern Africa, and Southern Europe, reaped golden harvests that annually flowed from these prolific sources of wealth.

The tracks of commerce did not then lie in the direction of our shores. The mighty magnets of civilized communities, of organized Territories, of dignified and influential States, of cultivated and prosperous cities, of energetic and ambitious populations, of productive mines, of prolific fields of agriculture, of pastoral wealth, of vineyards unsurpassed in beauty and fruitfulness, of industry, of enterprise—of all that is implied in the titular designation of empire in its most comprehensive sense and which now constitute the States and Territories of the far West—formidable, majestic, and wealthy rivals in commercial greatness of an equal number of any of the most enterprising and wealthy of the sisterhoods, did not then exist to attract to our western shores the merchants of the east and the west, and the ships of Europe and Asia and their dependencies. To-day it is different. No longer does the miner of the Pacific States and Territories send to Chili for bread to sustain life, or to France for wine to cheer the failing spirits, as he was compelled to and did do a quarter of a century ago; for California's export trade to-day is nearly forty millions, her wheat crop worth in value nearly forty millions, her wine crop reaching annually from 6,000,000 to 8,000,000 gallons, or more than double the whole wine crop of the United States in 1870, the total of which was then but 3,092,330 gallons, while the inward and outward tonnage of San Francisco alone is not less than 1,550,000 tons. In 1876 the inward foreign tonnage was 728,319 tons and the outward foreign tonnage 760,770 tons; while Oregon, surpassing in proportional productive capacity her more widely-known neighboring State, with her population of 160,000 souls, raises annually not less than 8,000,000 bushels of wheat, and exports annually an aggregate of over $100 to every man, woman, and child within its limits, these consisting of wheat, flour, wool, beef, fish, timber, lumber, furs, fruits, coal, and other products, including gold and silver bullion.

The ablest and most far-seeing statesman of a quarter of a century ago had not the faintest conception of the immense natural resources, the wonderful capabilities, the vital elements, the internal and external wealth, and commercial greatness and grandeur of the western shores of this continent. Daniel Webster, in speaking of California in this Chamber in 1850, (I quote from a recent work,) used this language:

I am sure that everybody has become satisfied that although California may have a very great seaboard and a large city or two, yet that the agricultural products of the whole surface now are not and never will be equal to one-half part of those of the State of Illinois, no, nor yet a fourth or perhaps a tenth part, no one will pretend to deny.

Yet, notwithstanding this prophetic declaration from the lips of one of the ablest, most far-seeing, and eminent statesmen this country has ever known, before twenty-four years had passed away California produced more wheat per annum by $2,191,280 in value than the State of Illinois, and more by $1,063,480 in value than any other State in the Union, while to-day its wheat crop exceeds in value that of the State of Illinois by more than $15,000,000; its barley crop is over four times that of Illinois; its wool crop double that of Illinois and greater than that of any other State in the Union except Ohio. But not only so; the Pacific States and Territories in 1877 exported about 40 per cent. of the total exports of wheat from the United States to foreign lands, perhaps not so much the past year owing to the drouth in California, and the day is not in the distant future when over one-half of all the wheat exported from the United States will be grown in the States of California and Oregon and Territory of Washington, while Oregon and Washington, I confidently predict, will produce over half of this amount, or one-fourth of our total exports. Although the Pacific belt, from Behring Strait to the thirty-third parallel of north latitude and from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean, is the greatest gold and silver producing area of the world, producing annually over eighty millions of these precious metals, yet this annual product of this extended field, immense and princely in value as it is, is to-day dwarfed into comparative insignificance in commercial value and national importance by its annual contributions to the commerce of the world in the shape of grain, lumber, timber, fruits, wine, fish, wool, and kindred products.

In speaking of this subject the Chicago Journal of Commerce, in a recent editorial, makes this truthful statement:

When Oregon and Washington came into actual possession of our people, who even dreamed that they would become distinguished for the abundance of good qualities of their wheat fields? And yet ordinary men, attracted to the Pacific coast by the reports from its mines, its fish, and its game, but were disappointed in their expectations, retrieved their fortunes by sowing and reaping wheat and cultivating fruit. And now this immense coast is the wonder of all lands, for it pours into the lap of commerce grain, fruits, and fish beyond any other country known to man.

Yes, Mr. President, well may this influential patron and advocate of the nation's commerce speak of the Pacific coast in reference to its grain, its fruits, its fish as the "wonder of all lands," and of its contributions to the "lap of commerce" as being "beyond any other country known to man."

Well may it be said, in the apt and scriptural quotation of Professor Robert Ellis Thompson, of the University of Pennsylvania, in a recent article from his pen on our commercial future, that the great North Pacific coast is "a land where thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack any thing in it; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass." (Deut., viii, 9.)

But, again, hear what the San Francisco Journal of Commerce, located as it is in the midst of this mighty domain of unparalleled capabilities for productiveness, said two years ago. After speaking of the wheat-producing areas of the Pacific States and Territories, it uses the following language:

This Territory is thus capable of producing 2,500,000,000 bushels of wheat annually, worth, at the low rate of fifty cents, $1,250,000,000, or at seventy-five cents per bushel, or $1.25 per cental, $1,875,000,000. It would feed a population of 500,000,000, or something less than one-half the whole population of the earth at the present time—a population exceeding that of Europe and Africa, or Europe and America together, nearly twice that of British India, and greater, even, than the teeming population of the great empire of China.

After speaking further of the great fertility of the wheat-producing valleys of the Pacific Northwest, speaking of them as the peers of the celebrated valley of the Nile, which in ancient times supplied the world with bread, it proceeds as follows:

In days to come these valleys will do the same for the great world of India, China, and Japan, which, with their vast populations, are now opening up to our commerce and to Caucasian civilization. The populations of these vast regions are at present estimated as equaling 750,000,000 of people. By and by a large proportion of these, at least one-third, will become as accustomed to wheaten breads as are the urban populations of Europe to-day, and the sources of supply for them will naturally be the Pacific coast of the United States. California and Oregon are capable of producing 1,065,000,000 bushels of wheat yearly from their wheat lands, and this will supply over 200,000,000 of people. The wheat lands of the coast are extensive enough to supply a million farmers and their families with one-hundred-acre farms. Those of California are ample enough to locate a quarter of a million farmers of Europe and the older States on small-sized farms of their own, while those of California and Oregon have room for 430,000. Reckoning in workmen and their families, the wheat lands of the coast can give employment in their cultivation to a population of 15,000,000; while taking into account tradesmen, manufacturers, merchants, &c., they can support in comfort and affluence not less than 35,000,000, or a population equal to that of France to-day, greater than of Italy or Great Britain, and almost equal to that of Germany, and those countries are the greatest and most powerful on the globe. In fine, the capacity of the coast as a wheat producer, and only on these lands which are immediately available for tillage, is equal to nine times the largest production of the whole United States in the best crop years recorded.

It is proper to remark in this connection that at the time the above was written, two years ago, the great extent and unparalleled capacity of the wheat-producing area of Oregon and Washington Territory were but partially known or understood. These mighty factors in external and internal commercial prosperity to which I have attracted attention, operating as they do through our foreign and coastwise trade, have transformed the waters of the Pacific Ocean between the strait of Fuca and San Francisco into one vast national highway, where pass and repass daily in scores the ships of all nations. Four regular steamship lines are now operating regularly the whole distance between San Francisco and Portland, Oregon, via the mouth of the Columbia River, one between Portland and Sitka, and one between San Francisco, the straits, and Puget Sound, to say nothing of the fleets of first-class sailers. According to official figures during the past twelve months an average of 3,150 persons passed each month by ocean steamers from San Francisco to Portland, Oregon, and an average of 1,166 each month from Portland to San Francisco, making a total average of 4,316 persons each month, or an aggregate of 51,792 souls, not including officers and crews of vessels, who have passed up and down this coast during the last year on ocean steamers alone as through passengers between those ports; while the trade of ports to the northward of San Francisco with the Sandwich and other Pacific Ocean islands, South America, Central America, China, and Japan is gradually growing into importance; while from the distant British Isles annually come in their long and perilous journey around Cape Horn and up the waters of the north Pacific to the Columbia River and Portland, Oregon, hundreds of the largest sailers, to carry from Oregon to Liverpool our surplus millions of the finest wheat of the continent. Will it be said, therefore, that Congress will not inquire into the conditions of the harbors of that coast, or that Government will refuse to enter upon a work so imperatively demanded by the true interests of commerce? While the Atlantic coast from the Bay of Fundy to Florida Keys, through the generous and just action of our Government, is lined with breakwaters, artificial harbors of refuge, light-houses, life-saving stations, and other aids to marine commerce and protection to life and property on the high seas, must the mariners, the shippers, the traveling public of the North Pacific Ocean for nearly two thousand miles of sea-coast be left to brave comparatively unaided the daily perils of what not unfrequently would seem to be a misnamed and treacherous Pacific?

From a personal experience of over thirty voyages between the ports of San Francisco and Portland I am able to speak with some degree of accuracy in reference not only to the commerce and its necessities but the perils also of this coast. I will only say in reference to these last that while they are no greater than those of ordinary ocean travel, and in fact much less than those of many other routes, they are, nevertheless, none the less, as some may suppose, from the fact that these are waters of an ocean called the Pacific. But no other weightier argument is needed than that conveyed in the lists of marine disasters I hold in my hand—disasters which have occurred on the Pacific Ocean on the coast line north of San Francisco since January 1, 1861, and which I ask to have incorporated in my remarks. These lists, aggregating as they do disasters to some four hundred and twenty-seven vessels, resulting in many instances in total loss, to say nothing of the loss of cargo and human life, speak in tones more convincing than any mere words of mine, not only of the extent of the shipping in these waters, but of the present need of governmental aid for this shipping.

The first of these lists that contains a statement of the disasters between January 1, 1861, and December 31, 1869, was obtained from custom-house statistics in San Francisco, and furnished by Captain William Tichenor, of Oregon, to the Alta of that city, and published in that paper in its issue of March 10, 1873. The other, containing statement of disasters from January 1, 1870, to the present time, has been furnished me by S. I. Kimball, esq., general superintendent of the United States life-saving service of the Treasury Department, and is authentic:

I have, Mr. President, thus reluctantly felt constrained to bring forward this array of marine loss of life and property, believing that true statesmanship would not, for mere temporary benefit or local pride, permit any concealment of the truth or suppression of real facts.

The permanent aid to our commerce designed by the pending bill will, I trust, in the future, when years shall have passed away, more than compensate for any supposed temporary cloud that may be thrown over the commerce of that coast by a truthful exposition, not only of its extent and advantages, but of its disadvantages and perils as well. While we may not in all things welcome Mahomet as our pattern, he, we are told, "destroyed to save, and planted science and art in fields fertilized by blood." The physician who would effect a cure in an intelligent and speedy manner must of necessity understand the nature of the disease and the perils to which the patient is exposed, and how often then to save must the knife be applied and the limb amputated.

The true sentinel on the watch-tower, unlike the pirates on the coast of Barbary who allure but to deceive and destroy, will proclaim aloud to approaching fleets the dangers of the passage.

The Government, in view of these frequent disasters, has within the past two years taken one important step in the right direction by establishing, through the very efficient United States life-saving service, eight life-saving stations on this coast, to wit: at Neah Bay, Shoalwater Bay, Cape Disappointment, Cape Arago, Humboldt Bay, Bolinas Bay, Golden Gate Park, and Point Conception. This was done in accordance with an act of Congress passed in 1874; and the service should be extended to other points. Impressed, therefore, Mr. President, with this view of my duty, feeling called upon to "cry aloud and spare not," I feel constrained, in addition to what I have already stated on this branch of my subject, to call attention to the following statement made by the United States board of engineers for the Pacific coast in their report of February 14, 1877:

> The distance from San Francisco to Neah Bay, at the entrance to the strait of Fuca, is seven hundred nautical miles. While there are many open anchorages scattered along the coast between these places which afford reasonable good protection for vessels against the prevailing northwest winds and seas in summer, there are none for this entire distance that a vessel can enter in heavy southerly weather when the wind is south, southeast, or southwest, as it frequently is in the winter season. It is true that vessels can generally cross the bar of the Columbia River and seek shelter at secure anchorages on the river. But this is not always the case. In heavy southerly weather, when a harbor of refuge is most wanted, vessels dare not approach the bar of this river. It cannot therefore be considered a secure harbor of refuge. A good harbor of refuge ought, of course, to provide secure anchorage for all vessels for all winds from whatever direction. But what is more particularly needed on this coast is protection against heavy southerly storms.

This board, proceeding further to give their views in the report referred to upon the proposition as to whether the Government should build one large breakwater on this coast, inclosing a capacious harbor, or several smaller ones distributed along the coast, uses the following language:

> One of the first questions which arise in consideration of this subject is whether, in case protection for vessels is to be sought by artificial constructions, we should build one large breakwater, inclosing a capacious harbor, or several smaller ones distributed along the coast, each affording protection for a few vessels only. Our examinations and studies of this question have satisfied us that if any breakwater is to be built on the coast now under consideration, it should be large enough to afford all the protection that is needed for a harbor at that place for the present and for many years to come. We are led to this conclusion principally because any construction at any place on the coast affording secure anchorage for even a few vessels will necessarily be very expensive; and before undertaking any second work we should profit by the experience to be acquired by the first.

Again, Major John M. Wilson, of the United States Engineer Corps, and for over three years in charge of river and harbor improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory, in his report on Port Orford, of date September 23, 1878, says:

> The prevailing winds on the coast from November until April are from the south and southwest. In May they veer around to the north and northwest and continue in that direction until about October. The gales most dreaded by mariners are from the southwest and are at times fearful in their severity. On the whole of this northwest coast between San Francisco and the strait of Fuca, a distance of seven hundred and fifty miles, there is no harbor that a sailing-vessel will attempt to enter during a heavy southerly gale. A harbor of refuge is absolutely necessary, and nature seems to have indicated that Port Orford by its location and natural advantages should be selected for man to complete, and thus present a safe harbor to which mariners can run for shelter in any gale.

The Legislature of the State of Oregon at its late session gave expression to their views on this subject through a memorial to Congress, which I hold in my hand, and which reads as follows:

> To the Senate and House of Representatives > of the United States in Congress assembled:
> Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that on the northwest coast of the United States, between Point Reyes to Puget Sound, a distance of more than two degrees of latitude, there is no harbor that a vessel can enter in heavy southern weather. The imperative necessity for the creation of a port of refuge is illustrated with emphasis, by the immense loss of life and property annually occasioned by our winter gales. During the last winter, seven vessels with their entire crews were lost, and are only another addition to the sad disasters of past years. The increase of the commerce of the coast is fully 50 per cent. annually, and no question is of more importance to our merchants and ship-owners than the creation of a port to which the commerce can resort for safety during stress of weather. Commissioners have been appointed to examine the different points as to their practicability for an improvement of the character demanded, and reports made, as far as your petitioners have been informed, all concur that the most practical point, the one offering the greatest number of advantages, is Ewing Harbor or Port Orford; it is geographically central between San Francisco and Puget Sound, the most western point on the coast; the largest roadstead, admitting vessels of the largest size, good anchorage, material of the best quality immediately at hand for use and all improvements, never subject to fogs, easy of access, with no danger of a lee shore; and believing, as we do, from all the advantages possessed by the point named, we would ask for the immediate construction of port of refuge irrespective of any local considerations, and would so pray.
> Adopted by the house, September 13, 1878.
> J. M. THOMPSON,
> Speaker of the House.
> Concurred in by the senate, September 25, 1878.

That the vast interests involved in the present commerce of these waters, the present disadvantages and perils being considered, would more than justify an immediate expenditure of the amount necessary to complete within a year a breakwater and harbor of refuge, were such a thing a physical possibility, there can be, it seems to me, no question. When you take into consideration the time that must necessarily be employed in completing a great maritime work like this, even with the most lavish appropriations and under the most favorable conditions, the necessity for the speedy commencement of the work becomes at once conclusively apparent.

A suggestion or two in regard to the great length of time necessarily required in completing any such work: a partial breakwater according to a survey made at Trinidad on the Pacific coast, estimated to cost $3,076,500, containing 762,000 cubic yards of stone, and requiring two tons to the cubic yard, would, according to the report of the board of United States engineers for the Pacific coast, with the necessary money appropriated each year, require under the most favorable circumstances of wind and tide nearly eight years in the construction; while the completion of the whole work, costing according to the estimate $7,694,500, would under like favorable circumstances require necessarily seventeen and nine-tenths years in completing it. The board of engineers for the Pacific coast, therefore, very properly state in reporting upon the necessities of a breakwater on the Pacific coast, that although the interests of commerce at any time on any particular coast may not be of such magnitude as to require so vast an expenditure immediately, still, say they, if we can fix upon any time in the future when the wants of commerce will require one, it is manifest from the great magnitude of the work, as well as the uncertainty of the appropriations, that such a construction should be commenced more than twenty years before that time. If, therefore, a work of this character should in the opinion of our Engineer Corps be begun twenty years before the commercial necessities required it, then, a fortiori, may I insist upon the inauguration of this work when the magnitude of the commercial interests are such, as I confidently insist I have shown them to be, as to require it now.

Now, as to the point of location. And as to this I insist that the principle of the "greatest good to the greatest number" should prevail in the construction of a great national work such as this must necessarily be. While Congress may not undertake to, and perhaps should not, select or undertake to decide definitely as between points within certain parallels of latitude, within and between which it must be apparent to all the harbor should be located, still it is the duty of Congress, upon its knowledge of geographical lines and distances, the nature and extent of the commerce intended to be benefited, the area of the arc of the sea within which the shipping is to be aided by the contemplated work, to determine definitely the lines within which the work should be located. In this instance the commerce to be benefited is, in one sense, that of a coast extending from San Francisco to Behring Strait, a distance of over two thousand miles; but more directly and immediately that of a coast extending from San Francisco to the strait of Fuca, a distance of seven hundred miles. It is clearly evident then, at a glance, that this harbor of refuge should be located as far to the northward at least as half the distance from San Francisco to the mouth of the straits. A breakwater constructed at any point south of this would not give that general and equal protection to the shipping intended to be protected by the construction of one such breakwater on that coast. A central point between San Francisco and the strait of Fuca would be a point about three hundred and fifty miles north of San Francisco, on the Oregon coast. The forty-second parallel of north latitude is distanced a fraction less than three hundred miles north of San Francisco, and about midway between San Francisco and the mouth of the Columbia; and therefore I have provided in the pending bill that it shall be located at some point north of that parallel. This should be so, whether the interests of commerce require that this marine asylum for ships should be located centrally between the great ports of San Francisco and Astoria or midway between San Francisco and the strait of Fuca. But inasmuch as there are various candidates for the honor north of that and within the line of the central location, and at two of which at least surveys have been made under the direction of Congress, to wit, at Port Orford and Foulweather, I have provided that it shall be at such point between the line of the forty-second parallel and the strait of Fuca as the board of United States engineers for the Pacific coast, or the majority of them, may select. Either Port Orford, Coos Bay, or Foulweather would doubtless be sufficiently central. Port Orford is about midway between the strait of Fuca and San Francisco, while Foulweather is one hundred and twenty miles to the northward, Coos Bay being between the two.

I hold in my hand reports of surveys and estimates made within the past year by the engineer department under the direction of the Secretary of War in pursuance of an act of Congress of June, 1878, at Port Orford and Cape Foulweather, which I beg to incorporate into my remarks. From these it will be observed various estimates are submitted for different kinds and dimensions of artificial structures, and the great question to be determined in inaugurating a national work of this character, namely, its location and extent, is, in view of these different proposed localities and estimates, one that manifestly belongs to the Engineer Corps rather than to Congress. Since I have been in the Senate the Legislature of Oregon has memorialized Congress at different times in favor of both Port Orford and Foulweather. Differences of opinion among the unscientific will necessarily exist while conflict of opinion resulting from conflict of mere personal interest and personal wish, regardless of the great overshadowing question of national interest, is sure to arise. Who, then, is better qualified to decide between these various conflicting views than the Engineer Corps of the Army, who by law are placed in charge of the improvement of our rivers and harbors, educated as they are by the Government with special reference to a proper performance of these important duties?

From these considerations, then, it is proposed by the pending bill to submit the question of locality to the determination of a majority of the United States board of engineers for the Pacific coast. It will be observed the estimate of the total cost of the proposed breakwater at Port Orford of 5,000 feet in length, running from the outer part of the head toward Coal Point, and which would, as stated in the report of Major John M. Wilson, engineer in charge, "secure a harbor of about three hundred acres with depth of from four to twelve fathoms outside of the three-fathom curve," and "give ample protection to a large fleet during the heaviest gales," is $9,405,000, while the total estimate of one 2,000 feet long at the same place, and which the engineer in his report states would "secure a valuable anchorage of about ninety acres with equal depth," and which would "for present purposes be sufficient," as it could be extended whenever the commerce rendered it necessary, is $3,427,000.

Major Wilson in his report on Port Orford makes this statement as a result of his investigations of that locality:

> After a careful examination of this subject, I beg to report that in my opinion Port Orford is a very valuable point for a harbor of refuge. It is easily accessible, occupies a position nearly midway between San Francisco and the strait of Fuca, presents a deep and capacious harbor offering secure anchorage from gales from all points except south, southeast, and southwest, is not subjected to northwest fogs, has no shifting sand-bars or hidden reefs within its limits; the land around is high and prominent and presents all the necessary materials easy and accessible for a stone breakwater. All that is now needed to make it a secure harbor of refuge at all seasons is a breakwater, behind which vessels can ride safely at anchor during winds coming from the southeast, south, and southwest, from which it is not already protected by nature. A careful examination of the chart of the currents and the general direction of the gales leads me to the conclusion that a breakwater about 5,000 feet long, running from the outer point of the head toward Coal Point, would give ample protection to a large fleet during the heaviest gales. For present purposes 2,000 feet would be sufficient, and this could be extended whenever it became necessary.

He says further in this connection:

> I think this breakwater should be connected with the headland, and that the United States should purchase so much of the head as will be necessary for works of defense after the harbor is completed and for stone-quarries, buildings, &c., for the construction of the breakwater.

I now attract attention to the estimates and remarks of engineers in reference to the proposed breakwater at Cape Foulweather. Three several plans and estimates are submitted as to this locality. The first proposes a breakwater starting from near Yaquina Head, running west, then curving to the north and terminating about a mile and a half from the cape.

Such a harbor—

Says Major Wilson in his report—> would present a large area amply protected from southwest gales with a depth of from three to eight fathoms. The cape proper already presents a good protection from gales from the north and northwest.

This work would require a breakwater of about 9,900 feet in length, and the estimate of its total cost is $11,462,487.

The engineer reports, however, further, to use his own language, that—

> It is highly probable that for present purposes a breakwater would be sufficient starting from Yaquina Head running on the line projected, terminating in four and a half fathoms water, and having a length of 4,900 feet.

The total estimate for such a work is $4,606,122. Such a breakwater would make a harbor of about two hundred acres, protected from gales from the south and southwest.

Major Wilson still further reports that from the examination made under his direction by Assistant Engineer Robert A. Habersham, and from his report and his own observation, he is of the opinion that a better harbor can be made north of the cape than south of it. To use his own language:

> By constructing a breakwater running in a northwest direction just inside the reef running out from the cape, such a breakwater would be about 600 feet long and would contain within it an available anchorage of from 50 to 100 acres, with a depth of from 3 to 8 fathoms.

The total cost of this latter work is estimated at $656,251.

Such a harbor—

Says Assistant Engineer Habersham in his report—> would satisfy present necessities not only as a refuge and also as a port of entry, Yaquina Bay being accessible only to light-draught coasting-vessels, and it may be enlarged at any future time, if desired, by extending the harbor along the reef.

To correct what seems to have been a false impression, I beg attention to the following extract from the report of Major Wilson in reference to the reef of rocks off Yaquina Bay:

> About three and one-half miles south of Cape Foulweather is Yaquina Bay, the mouth of Yaquina River. A railroad is projected to connect this bay with the Willamette River. It is anticipated that when that is completed a large amount of grain and other products now finding its way to market via the Columbia and Willamette will seek an outlet via Yaquina Bay. About three-fourths of a mile off the entrance to this bay a dangerous reef of rocks extending in a north and south direction, with many narrow and dangerous channels across it, is reported by the Coast Survey and laid down on their charts. I am informed that the residents in the vicinity presume that the reef extends from Yaquina Head toward the cape, and incloses an area of about one thousand acres—the ridge being, they thought, well defined, and that upon it a breakwater could be constructed which would form a fine harbor of refuge. As far as I could learn, the object of this survey was to locate a breakwater upon this supposed reef for a harbor of refuge. The chart of the United States Coast Survey shows no such reef, and a very careful examination by Assistant Engineer Habersham shows that four reefs of rock, apparently much harder than the rest of the bottom, from twelve to fourteen feet under low-water level, situated in a curved line in the direction above indicated, but distant from each other from one-fourth to one-half a mile, and with from six to eight fathoms of water between them. On these, during low tide, a heavy water or sea breaks constantly.

Major Wilson concludes his report on Cape Foulweather and the advantages of a breakwater there in these words:

> The value of the commerce to be benefited by this work would run up into millions, as the benefit would be felt by every vessel navigating the Pacific Ocean between San Francisco and the straits of Fuca. For the necessity for a harbor of refuge on the Northern Pacific coast, I respectfully call attention to the interesting and elaborate report of the board of engineers for the Pacific coast, dated February 14, 1877.

I have already called attention to this report, which, in strong language, points out the necessity for the early commencement of a harbor of refuge on the Pacific coast.

And now, in conclusion, may I recur once more with propriety to the magnitude of the Pacific Northwest and the material interests that center there—great not alone in territory and natural resources, in soil, in climate, in productiveness, but also in the bold, enterprising, self-reliant spirit of the pioneer people, who amid uncounted perils by sea and land have established on its shores, broad and deep, the foundations of a civilization whose structure in the ages to come shall be more than grand, whose light shall penetrate the remotest borders, and of a commerce which, if properly encouraged and sustained by national aids, will in the no distant future outstrip that of any country on the globe of either ancient or modern times. Will not, then, the influence of this Government, its wealth, its dignity, its power, be greatly augmented both at home and abroad by aiding in a proper manner the development of such a commerce and such a civilization, whether it be by aiding in the improvement of its rivers and harbors, the construction of its canals or railroads or of any other great national internal improvement, from which private capital and individual enterprise shrink and are afraid? Will not our Government gain wisdom from the legislation and history of other nations in the vital matter of national development through legitimate constitutional aid to internal improvements? How do Great Britain and France maintain their supremacy and extend their dominion over commerce into all lands and into every sea? Why is it that in the trade, for instance, of the West India Islands, Central America, and eastern South America, situate as they are at our very doors, we import annually over $155,000,000, and export to the same annually about $58,000,000, while England, situate from them across a mighty ocean, imports from their shores annually $121,576,000 and exports to them $117,237,000.

In other words, why is it that while in our total commerce with these countries, amounting to about $214,000,000 annually, and in which there is an annual average balance against us of over $98,000,000, the total of that of England with these same countries exceeds that of ours by nearly $25,000,000 annually, or amounts in all to about $238,800,000 annually, while her exports of this same trade only fall short of her imports by about $4,000,000 annually? Why is it that 62 per cent. of the importations which go into Japan come from Great Britain, while but 4 per cent., or less than one-fifteenth as much, are sent from the United States; or that of her export trade Great Britain receives 55 per cent., while we get but 17 per cent.? Why is it that while with pride we have hailed the coming in of the era that has changed the balance-sheet of our commerce with Europe, which now shows that our exports are largely in excess of our imports, and which points so strongly and unmistakably to our future prosperity, we are humiliated by seeing the marts of our immediate neighboring countries filled with the products of Europe, amounting to millions in value in excess annually of those from our own shores, many of which are in truth the products of this country, shipped by us to England and by that country sent back to the West Indies, and nearly all of which we are so abundantly able to produce and supply? Why have we in the last fifty years failed to increase the value of our export trade to Mexico, with all her many wants, which we ought to supply, and lying upon our borders? They were $5,000,000 half a century ago; they are less now, being only about $4,500,000 out of her $29,000,000 annual importations. Why is it that of the $90,000,000 and over imported annually by Brazil, the United States furnishes less than one-twelfth part, or only about $7,000,000, and this in the main indirectly through the ports of Great Britain? Why is it that of $60,000,000 purchased annually by the Argentine Confederation we sell them but little in excess of $2,000,000? Why of the $170,000,000 of South American imports do we furnish less than one-eighth part, while France sends three-eighths, and Great Britain one-half; or, of the $100,000,000, or about that, purchased annually by Cuba, do we send them but one-seventh part, or about $14,000,000? Why of the over $300,000,000 imported annually by Russia are Great Britain and Germany able to supply over $220,000,000, or nearly 75 per cent. of the whole amount?

Why is it that Great Britain, with a less population than the United States and infinitely less natural resources, has within the past generation increased her annual import and export trade from less than £80,000,000 sterling to nearly $3,000,000,000, or about £600,000,000 sterling? Why is it that her export trade to-day is in the aggregate nearly double that of the United States, and more than double per capita of population that of our country? Why is it that although now our annual exports largely exceed our imports, even in the past year to the extent of $261,733,045, Europe should send from her storehouse into the markets of the world about $1,115,000,000 annually, while we, with our unparalleled capacity to supply so great a proportion of the wants of Christendom, export annually only about $707,771,153, including merchandise, coin, and bullion; or only $680,709,268 in merchandise alone? Why has American tonnage, entered at ports in the United States, increased in the last ten years but 1,339,949, while foreign tonnage entered at our ports has increased in the same time 7,807,941? Or why is foreign tonnage entered at our ports to-day 12,218,365, while American tonnage in our ports is but 4,711,949, or 7,506,416 less; and this too in the face of the fact that ships can be built in this country to-day as cheap or cheaper than in England, whether constructed of wood or iron, and when, as I have seen it stated recently on reliable authority, the building of one ship of twenty-five hundred tons burden will give employment to and feed the average-sized families of six hundred men a year?

Why is all this so? Of course there are for it a number of reasons, all of which, however, may be summed up in the one general statement that the commerce of this country, both internal and international, never has received, and does not now receive, that national aid, sympathy, encouragement, and support that have been, are now, and ever will be in Great Britain, France, and other European countries such potent agencies in building up, maintaining, and extending the influence and power of the commerce of these nations. And this aid to our commerce, this development of our commercial resources must not be confined to merely one species of legislation, nor for the benefit of our internal to the exclusion of our external commerce, nor vice versa; nor should it be given at all, in a pecuniary sense, to those agencies wherein private capital for private gain will necessarily supply the want; but it should cover and include, to the extent of our fiscal ability, all reasonable and constitutional means, such as the improvement of our great rivers and harbors, the encouragement of domestic ship-building, the strengthening of our merchant marine by wholesome legislation in reference to the navigation laws; the securing of such commercial relations with foreign nations through treaties of reciprocity and otherwise, as will give our country at least an equal standing among the nations in the great conflict for the control of the commerce of the world. Why England, we are told, has expended in India alone over $500,000,000 in internal improvements, while many of her leading statesmen are to-day boldly advocating, and with fair prospect of success, an additional expenditure of $150,000,000 more to be expended in the single item of irrigating the desert lands of India. France, through a system of internal improvements, at one time doubled the value of her commerce in a little over five years. Similar and numerous examples may be gleaned from the history of other European as well as Asiatic countries; but time fails me.

It is a source of gratification that these great questions, which look to the development of the resources of our country, which more than anything else will tend to the real solution of all our labor troubles, the building up of commerce, the revival of our industries, giving employment to the million, and at the same time adding strength, and vitality, and power to our nation, both on land and sea, are attracting the serious attention of our Government and people. The recent message sent to Congress by the President bearing upon this subject of the revival of our commerce, with the very important accompanying letter from the Secretary of State, I regard as most timely, and the suggestions they contain of incalculable importance to the country. I trust they will receive the attention to which their importance justly entitle them. Well does Mr. Secretary Evarts suggest, in speaking of the South American trade, and after referring to the means through and by which Great Britain and other countries have obtained and controlled it, that it is "this enterprise and sagacity of European nations that have actually reversed the advantage which our geographical position gives us in relation to this extensive commerce of the American hemisphere."

And now should America, learning wisdom from other nations, profit by their examples. Their sagacity and their enterprise in these important respects are worthy of imitation by any nation or any people, and never was the occasion with us more opportune than now, our Government having through wise congressional action and most able, efficient, and praiseworthy executive administration upon the part of the present Secretary of the Treasury, business prosperity and public confidence co-operating, reached a specie basis, without even the slightest strain on the public credit or the least disarrangement of the business of the country; and when the signs of the times in view of this, the grandest financial achievement, when considered in the light of all the circumstances, of either ancient or modern times, point with unerring certainty to an early and complete resurrection of our business industries and a healthy revival of our prosperity as a nation and a people. And in the consideration of these great questions, while the South, rising from the ashes of her great affliction, should find remembrance in the just and generous action of a great and impartial Government, may it not be forgotten that among the potential elements which contribute in a large degree to the dignity, the wealth, the greatness, the grandeur, and the power of our nationality, and which tend to promote her pre-eminence and add to her invincibility among the nations, the least in importance and worth are not those that are being evolved from a civilization planted, cultured, fructified, amid perils, persecutions, bereavements, and tears on the western shores of our Republic.

I move the reference of the pending bill to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

The report referred to in the preceding remarks is as follows:

EXAMINATION OF CAPE FOULWEATHER HARBOR, OREGON.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Portland, Oregon, September 23, 1878.

GENERAL: I have the honor to transmit herewith a chart of Cape Foulweather Harbor, Oregon, together with the report of Mr. R. A. Habersham, assistant engineer, and to submit the following report of an examination and survey made under my direction in accordance with the act of Congress approved June 18, 1878.

Object of the examination.

The object of the examination and survey of this harbor was "to ascertain its adaptability as a harbor of refuge."

Early in August I organized a party for this work and placed it in charge of Mr. R. A. Habersham, assistant engineer, with orders to proceed to Cape Foulweather and make the necessary surveys to carry out the law. This party proceeded to Corvallis, Oregon, via the Willamette River; thence by wagons across the Coast Range of mountains to Newport, on Yaquina Bay, and thence to Cape Foulweather, where they camped until the survey was completed. On September 8 I visited Cape Foulweather and made a general examination of the locality.

Description of the harbors.

Cape Foulweather is situated on the western coast of Oregon, in latitude 44° 43′ north, longitude 124° 05′ west, and forms a headland boldly jutting out about three-fourths of a mile into the sea from the low beach, with high mountains in rear of it.

It is a mass of black basalt rising to a height of from 80 to 100 feet above the sea, the base honeycombed with caves formed by the action of the waves. The cape, by its position, forms bays on the north and south, the one fronting northwest and the other south and southwest. On the north the shore line is crescent-shaped, the outer extremity pointing north, a reef making out from it in a direction north-northeast a distance of about 5,000 feet, terminating at a lone rock about 1,800 feet from the beach. The depths on this reef vary from 10 to 30 feet, except for a distance of about 1,200 feet near the cape, where there is a channel of that width with a depth of from 30 to 40 feet. The lone rock referred to at the north end of the reef seems to be connected with a rocky point opposite on shore by a well-marked reef, upon which there is a depth of four fathoms.

The north bay is inclosed, therefore, on the east by the mainland, on the south by the cape, and on the west by the long reef. It is nearly a mile long, and about 1,700 feet wide between the three-fathom curve and the reef. It contains about 200 acres, with a depth of from 3 to 8 fathoms, and a sandy bottom. As far as could be judged, there is good holding ground for anchoring vessels, although I understand that no vessel has ever entered.

This south bay is formed by the main shore and the cape, and is protected on the east, north, and northwest. On the south and southwest it is open and exposed to the terrible southern gales, from which it is most desired to find shelter. The bottom is sandy, the depth gradually increasing from near the shore, where it is 3 fathoms, to 20 fathoms 2 miles off shore. The general depth, on a line drawn south from the cape, is from 4 to 6 fathoms.

Tides, fogs, &c.

The spring tides rise and fall about 9 feet. Dense fogs overhang the cape from time to time during the year, particularly during the month of July.

The harbor of refuge.

About 3½ miles south of Cape Foulweather is Yaquina Bay, the mouth of Yaquina River. A railroad is projected to connect this bay with the Willamette River. It is anticipated that when this is completed a large amount of grain and other produce now finding its way to market via the Willamette and Columbia Rivers will seek an outlet via Yaquina Bay.

About three-quarters of a mile off the entrance to this bay a dangerous reef of rocks, extending in a north and south direction, with many narrow and dangerous channels across it, is reported by the Coast Survey, and laid down on their charts. I am informed that the residents in the vicinity presumed that a reef extended from Yaquina Head toward the cape, and inclosed an area of about 1,000 acres, the ridge being, they thought, well defined, and that upon it a breakwater could be constructed which would form a fine harbor of refuge.

As far as I could learn, the object of this survey was to locate a breakwater upon this supposed reef for a harbor of refuge.

The chart of the United States Coast Survey shows no such reef, and the very careful examination of Assistant Engineer Habersham reports four knobs of rock apparently much harder than the rest of the bottom from 12 to 30 feet under low-water level situated in a curved line in the direction above indicated, but distant from each other from one-fourth to one-half a mile and with from 6 to 8 fathoms of water between them. On these during low tide and heavy weather the sea breaks constantly.

The chart transmitted herewith shows a breakwater projected on this line, starting from near Yaquina Head and running west, then curving to the north, and terminating about a mile and a half from the cape. Such a harbor would present a large area amply protected from southwest gales, with a depth of from 3 to 8 fathoms. The cape proper already presents a good protection from gales from the north and northwest. This breakwater would be about 9,900 feet long, and constructed upon the plan adopted by the board of engineers for the Pacific coast. It is described in their report of February 14, 1877, as follows:

"We propose to build the base of any breakwater up to the height of 15 feet below the level of low-water of small stone; that is to say, of such stone as any quarry will furnish, and while quarrying out this great mass to lay away all large stones of 5, 10, or 20 tons for the construction of that portion of the breakwater from 15 feet up to low-water. Upon this foundation we propose to build a masonry wall faced with granite 25 feet wide and 20 feet high, including foundation, protecting the seaward side by blocks of artificial stone (if natural cannot be obtained) of large size (20 to 30 tons each) and thoroughly paving the harbor side with large blocks of granite to receive without displacement the water that will be thrown over the wall in great storms."

The cost of such a breakwater is estimated by Assistant Engineer Habersham to be as follows:

Ninety-nine hundred feet, at $1,052.57 per foot	$10,420,443 00
Contingencies, 10 per cent	1,042,044 00
Total	11,462,487 00

It is highly probable that for present purposes a breakwater would be sufficient starting from Yaquina Head, running on the line projected, terminating in 4½ fathoms of water and having a length of 4,900 feet; such a work would cost as follows:

Forty-nine hundred feet, at $854.57 per foot	$4,187,393 00
Contingencies, 10 per cent	418,739 00

Such a breakwater would present an area of about 200 acres protected from gales from the south and southwest. The difficulty to be contended with in using this harbor would be that sailing-vessels entering during a southwest gale would be obliged in rounding the outer end to face the wind.

Assistant Engineer Habersham made a careful examination of the bay north of the cape; no survey has ever before been made, it is believed, of this bay, and as far as he could learn his boat was the first that ever entered it. He reports that it is a natural harbor of considerable extent without further improvement, and that he was informed that during southwest gales quite an area inside is comparatively smooth. Several of the seamen who were employed as boatmen on the survey, who had sailed for a number of years between San Francisco and Puget Sound and claimed to be familiar with the coast, said that if buoys were placed to mark the entrance, vessels could now enter for shelter from southwest gales. From the examination made under my direction by Assistant Engineer Habersham, and from his report and my own observation, I think a better harbor can be made north of the cape than south of it, by constructing a breakwater running in a northwest direction just inside the reef running out from the cape; such a breakwater would be about 600 feet long and would contain within it an available anchorage of from 50 to 100 acres with a depth of from 3 to 8 fathoms.

The plan for such a work would be similar to that already described, and the cost is estimated by Mr. Habersham at $656,251.

The harbor could be greatly increased in size by constructing a breakwater on the reef parallel to the shore already described.

This north harbor, with the 600-feet breakwater, would only be available in south and southwest gales; but during heavy weather from the northeast vessels could anchor on the other side of the cape.

Attention is respectfully invited to the interesting report of Assistant Engineer Habersham transmitted herewith. In making the examination there were numerous minor difficulties to overcome, and Mr. Habersham deserves credit for the efficient manner in which he carried out my instructions.

Cape Foulweather is in the collection district of Southern Oregon. The nearest port of entry is at Newport, Yaquina Bay; no revenue was collected during the last fiscal year; there were no foreign imports or exports; about 600 tons of assorted merchandise are brought in annually by coastwise vessels, which carry away lumber and oysters; two sailing-vessels of about 100 tons burden each, with a draught of 9 feet, are running between San Francisco and Yaquina Bay.

There is a first-order light-house on the cape, visible nineteen miles. The nearest works of defense are at the mouth of the Columbia River.

The value of the commerce to be benefited by this work would run up into millions, as the benefit would be felt by every vessel navigating the Pacific Ocean between San Francisco and the strait of Fuca.

For the necessity for a harbor of refuge on this Northern Pacific coast, I respectfully call attention to the interesting and elaborate report of the board of engineers for the Pacific coast dated February 14, 1877.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

JOHN M. WILSON,
Major of Engineers, Brevet Colonel United States Army.

Brigadier-General A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers United States Army.

REPORT OF MR. ROBERT A. HABERSHAM, ASSISTANT ENGINEER.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Portland, Oregon, September 16, 1878.

COLONEL: I have the honor to submit the following report of a survey "at Cape Foulweather, to ascertain its adaptability as a harbor of refuge," with a general plan of improvement, and an approximate estimate of its cost, made in pursuance of your instructions dated August 8 of the present year.

This work was performed between the 9th and 23d of the same month. To save repetition, I will here state that all depths given refer, unless otherwise specified, to the lowest of mean low tides, as nearly as could be determined from the tide tables for the Pacific coast, published in San Francisco, and from information furnished by residents of the locality.

No extreme tides occurred during the progress of the survey, not even at full moon, an unusual circumstance.

Topography and hydrography at Cape Foulweather and its vicinity.

From Yaquina Head, which marks the north side of the entrance to Yaquina River, the shore line runs a little to the east of north for 4 miles, to the end of South Foulweather Beach; thence westward for three-fourths of a mile to the southwest elbow of the cape, where it begins to curve northward and eastward until it reaches the extreme point of Cape Foulweather, which points north; thence southeast, curving round to east, to the point where the cape joins the mainland again; thence north for about 7 miles to a point known as Old Cape Foulweather.

The shore line of Cape Foulweather proper describes the figure of a half crescent, the curved tip pointing north. From this point a reef makes out in a nearly direct line, course north-northeast, for 5,025 feet, terminating in a bare rock, which, for convenience, I have called Round Rock, distant 1,800 feet from the low-tide line on the north beach, and immediately opposite Rocky Point, a vertical cliff formed of rock of the same character, of which it was formerly a portion, as the soundings show a well-marked ridge connecting them about 4 fathoms under water.

The depths on this long reef, which is nearly flat on its crest, vary from 10 to 30 feet from Round Rock to within 1,200 feet of the cape, where a depression occurs which shows from 30 to 40 feet; the center being the deepest. The north side of this gap is marked by a rock on which the swell breaks constantly, and which is said to be bare at extreme low tide.

It is seen that the cape forms two bays, one fronting northwest, the other south and southwest. The North Bay, the outlines of which have just been given, is inclosed on the east by the mainland; on the south and southwest by the cape; on the west by the long reef; and on the north by the reef which connects Round Rock with Rocky Point. It is nearly one mile in length and one-third of a mile across, the width being measured from the curve of 18 feet depth to the west reef, and contains about 200 acres. The bottom is sandy, generally smooth, forming good holding-ground as far as can be judged, no vessel or craft of any kind having up to this time entered here that I can learn. The depths vary from 3 to 8 fathoms.

The South Bay, so called, is open to the south and west. It is bounded on the north by the cape and on the east by the mainland. The bottom is sandy, sloping seaward, the depth increasing uniformly from near the beach, where it is 18 feet, to 20 fathoms at a distance of 2 miles from the shore. The general depth on a line drawn south from the cape is from 4 to 6 fathoms. It is rather a roadstead than a bay; and while it is easy of access from the ocean in any direction, is sheltered only from north and east winds, which are never violent.

From Yaquina Head to the north end of Foulweather Beach the shore presents a slope of from 50° to 80°, tolerably uniform in direction generally, but much broken by sharp points and by ravines and small valleys. The face of the cliff shows soft sandstone overlying at greater or less depths a bed of marl filled with fossil shells. Numerous small veins of water trickle down the face of the sandstone, softening it and contributing to the destructive action of the weather, while the marl underneath is also wearing away under the heavy blows of the surf.

Between Yaquina Head and the cape four streams large enough to furnish good water-power, flowing through small valleys more or less heavily timbered, enter the ocean. Except in these valleys the vegetation, although luxuriant, is of small growth, and consists of salal, whortleberry, fern, and scattering spruce shrubs. The beach is from 300 to 800 feet wide, generally sandy, but the frequent occurrence of rocks above the surface show that the sand has little depth. The shore north of the cape is of the same general character.

Cape Foulweather is a promontory, covered with a thick carpet of grass and fern, making out from the continent, its crest line running from east to west, at right angles to the general course of the shore line, crossing two conical summits respectively 400 and 350 feet high, descending the latter at a slope of about 30° and terminating in a flat point 80 feet above mean sea-level, on which the light-house stands. The neck where the promontory joins the continent is 2,300 feet across between low-water lines and about 200 feet above sea-level at its highest point. The promontory is a mass of dense, hard, black basalt, which seems to have been forced like a wedge into a cleft in the sandstone. It rises vertically from the sea to a height of from 80 to 150 feet, in many places overhanging the water; its face hollowed out into caverns and seamed with fissures, with sharp projections of fantastic shape; the whole crumbling away slowly from the effects of the winter frosts and rains. The base of the cliff is honey-combed with caves, some of which might well be called tunnels, as they extend a long distance into the rock. One is said to penetrate 80 feet in a direct line from the face. It was not possible to verify this statement by measurement, as the surf was washing in and out of the cave with great force, but it is probably not far from the truth. The west end of the cape is surrounded by a number of pinnacles of rock rising vertically to a height of from 40 to 80 feet out of the water. Seen from a boat at a short distance, this black, jagged mass towering into the air, with the surf lashing its base with a noise like thunder, the scene excels in grandeur the sight of Devil's Cañon and Cape Horn, on the Central Pacific Railroad; but it must be a sight of terror to the unfortunate mariner who should see it as a lee coast during a southwest gale.

Weather.

From November to April the prevailing winds are southerly. Sometimes strong west winds occur, changing round to northwest, breaking into heavy squalls, accompanied by rain, hail, thunder, and lightning. This is generally from February to April. The gales which are principally dreaded by mariners come from the southwest. These are sometimes so strong that a man cannot keep his feet, and pebbles as large as hazel-nuts are caught up from the beach and dashed against the light tower, a height of more than 100 feet. These gales reach a velocity of 60 miles per hour. Fogs so dense that the shore is not visible from a distance of 500 feet out at sea occur at all seasons, but principally during the month of July. Rain during the winter is not so frequent as in the Willamette Valley, but heavier; snow is of rare occurrence, always light, and soon melts.

For the information contained in this paragraph I am indebted to Captain S. P. Wass, custodian of the light-house at Cape Foulweather.

Tides.

The spring tides, with the ocean in its normal condition, rise and fall 9 feet. During strong west winds the high tides have reached a height of 12 feet above mean low-water mark. The influence of ordinary high tides extends to Pioneer, 30 miles above the mouth of the Yaquina, the tide rising and falling from 4 to 6 feet.

Location for a harbor of refuge.

It has generally been believed by the residents of the country around Yaquina Bay that a reef from 3 to 5 fathoms under water extends in a curved line from Yaquina Head toward Cape Foulweather, terminating about one and a half miles south of the cape, inclosing a basin having a smooth, sandy bottom, which covers an area of nearly 1,000 acres, and that a breakwater built along the crest of the supposed reef would convert the basin into a harbor of shelter for vessels in distress as well as a port of entry.

It was for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility of this project that a survey was requested by those interested, among whom may be included all of the people of that section of Oregon whose nearest outlet to the ocean lies through the valley of the Yaquina River. The chart of the United States Coast Survey in this locality and my soundings over the same ground show that no such reef exists. There are 4 knobs of sandstone, harder than the rest of the bottom, from 12 to 30 feet under low-water level, situated in a curved line in the direction above indicated, but distant from each other from one-fourth to one-half a mile, and with from 36 to 50 feet of water between them. On these, during low tides and heavy swells, the sea breaks constantly, suggesting the presence of a continuous reef.

The length of breakwater which this project contemplates would be 9,900 feet, with an average depth of 26 feet below low-tide level.

Its cost per linear foot, on the general plan recommended by the board of engineers, Pacific coast, would be as follows:

Ashlar masonry, 21.67 cubic yards, at $18	$410 60
Rubble masonry, 14.08 cubic yards, at $9	126 72
Small rough rubble, 73.00 cubic yards, at $3	219 00
Large rough rubble, 59.25 cubic yards, at $5	296 25
Per linear foot	1,052 57
Nine thousand linear feet, at $1,052.57	10,420,443 00
Add for contingencies 10 per cent.	1,042,044 30

The estimate for rough rubble may appear excessive, but the stone would have to be brought from Cape Foulweather, the nearest point where hard rock is found, and where, owing to the prevalence of heavy seas, the loading of barges would be expensive and dangerous, often impossible, necessitating the suspension of the work until the recurrence of smoother water should allow the boats to approach the quarries with safety.

There is no question that such a work, if carried out, would greatly benefit navigation by affording shelter from southwest gales. Some such protection is absolutely required. But a better harbor, at much less cost, would be secured by building a breakwater from the extreme point of Cape Foulweather northward, inside of the reef above described, for a distance of 600 feet. This would inclose an area of about 100 acres, under the lee of the cape, with good anchorage in from 4 to 8 fathoms of water, having a free entrance from the west 1,200 feet wide. Such a harbor would satisfy the present necessities, not only as a refuge but also as a port of entry, Yaquina Bay being accessible only to light-draught coasting vessels; and it might be enlarged at any future time, if desired, by extending the breakwater along the reef.

The cost per linear foot of a breakwater here, on the plan recommended, would be, as nearly as can be estimated from the data obtained, as follows, its dimensions being: Length 600 feet, average depth below low tide 31 feet.

Ashlar masonry	$410 60
Rubble masonry	126 72
Small rough rubble, 110 cubic yards, at $2	220 00
Large rough rubble, 59.25 cubic yards, at $4	237 00
Per linear foot	994 32
Making for its length of 600 feet	596, 592 00
Add for contingencies 10 per cent	59, 659 20
Total	656, 251 20

Here the stone could be obtained from the shore end of the wall and hauled in cars along the top, extending the track as the work progressed, making the cost of transportation less than in the south bay. The above estimates are in gold coin.

The hydrographic work of the Coast Survey in this vicinity terminates at the extremity of Cape Foulweather. No survey had ever been made of this bay, and, so far as I could learn, my boat was the first that had ever entered it. It is a natural harbor of considerable extent, even without improvement. I am informed that during southwest gales the whole of the area inside of the reef is comparatively smooth, and the southeast portion quite so. Several of the seamen employed as boatmen on this survey, who had sailed for a number of years between San Francisco and Puget Sound, and claimed to be familiar with the coast and its climate, said that if two buoys were placed to mark the entrance, and the fact published for the information of mariners, vessels of any draught could enter here, not only for shelter, but for purposes of commerce. If this opinion be correct—and there seems to be no reason to the contrary—the circumstance is of interest in connection with the fact that a narrow-gauge railway is now under construction from Corvallis, on the Willamette, to Yaquina Bay.

Last winter there were a number of vessels in distress off Cape Foulweather at different times, and one that I am aware of was lost, with all on board. In describing this bay I omitted to mention that there is a rock on which the swell breaks during westerly and northerly weather. It is small, and lies about 500 feet from the mainland, nearly opposite the entrance. It is not in the way of vessels anchoring.

Learning that a cove, with good anchorage, existed about ten miles north of the cape, and wishing to get all information possible on the subject of a refuge, I went there by sea, two members of my party being familiar with the spot. I found it to be an indentation in the rocky coast, three-fourths of a mile long and about 1,000 feet wide; its longer diameter parallel to the general direction of the coast line with from 6 to 10 fathoms depth, well sheltered from north wind, but open to the west and southwest. This place is called Wrecker's Cove, the name having been given by men who saved, or, rather, collected, some fragments of the schooner Uncle Sam, lost a mile north of the cove about two years since.

Respectfully submitted.

Assistant Engineer.

EXAMINATION OF PORT ORFORD HARBOR, OREGON.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Portland, Oregon, September 23, 1878.

GENERAL: I have the honor to transmit herewith a chart of Port Orford Harbor, Oregon, and to submit the following report of an examination made by me in accordance with the act of Congress approved June 18, 1878.

Object of the examination.

The object of the examination of this harbor was "to ascertain its adaptability for a harbor of refuge."

I left Portland, Oregon, on the morning of September 2, 1878, for Port Orford, 330 miles distant, reaching the latter place on the evening of September 4, the journey requiring three days.

I fortunately had a fine opportunity to judge of the capacity and availability of the harbor, as I entered it from the Pacific Ocean during a northwest gale, and our vessel anchored in 7 fathoms, opposite "Battle Rock," in smooth water.

I remained two days at the harbor, during which I made a careful examination of it and its surroundings, and conversed freely with all parties who were acquainted with its general character and the force and direction of the seas from which it needs protection.

Description of the harbor.

Port Orford, the most westerly port of the United States south of Alaska, is situated on the western coast of North America, in latitude 42° 44′, longitude 124° 29′, and according to the Coast Pilot of Oregon, published by authority of the Coast Survey, is by far the best summer roadstead on the Pacific coast between Los Reyes and the strait of Fuca.

The harbor is deep and capacious, and is formed by a headland boldly jutting out into the sea, nearly vertical on its water face, the portion forming the shelter from westerly gales attaining an altitude of about 350 feet; from the outer point the ground slopes gradually down to an elevation of about 60 feet above low-water, near the northern part of the bay, opposite which the town of Port Orford is situated.

The survey made by the Coast Survey, and plotted on their chart, is reported as follows by the Coast Pilot:

"From the extremity of the southwest point eastward to the main shore the distance is two miles, and from this line to the greatest bend of the shore northward the distance is one mile.

"The soundings within this space range from 16 fathoms close to Tichenor's Rock, forming the southwest point of the bay, to 3 fathoms within one-fourth of a mile of the beach on the northeast side, with 5 fathoms at the base of the rocky points on the northwest side toward Tichenor's Rock; one mile of the shores of the bay the average depth is about 14 fathoms, regularly decreasing inshore."

From my own examination and all the information I could collect, I find the bottom of the harbor to be of sand and mud, presenting a good holding-ground, and that there are no sunken rocks or hidden reefs to endanger vessels after getting inside the head. It is said that northwest fogs seldom, if ever, enter the roadstead, which gives it, consequently, a great advantage over other harbors on the coast south of the Columbia River.

From my own observation I am led to believe this is so. While off the coast, between Cape Arago and Port Orford, a dense fog enveloped the shore; but when we reached Cape Blanco this seemed to veer off and follow the line of the reef north of Orford, and we entered the harbor where it was perfectly clear. On the following day, while examining the coast north of Orford on shore I found a dense fog enveloping Cape Blanco, seven miles north, while at Port Orford it was perfectly clear and pleasant.

Tides.

The mean rise and fall of tides is 5.1 feet; of spring tides, 6.8 feet; and of neap tides, 3.7 feet.

Danger in entering the harbor.

Between Port Orford and Cape Blanco, and about 3 miles off the coast, there is a group of rocky islets and sunken rocks called Orford Reef, which renders the approach to Port Orford from the north somewhat dangerous; there is, however, a good wide ship-channel between this reef and the main shore.

General remarks.

In reference to the present condition of the harbor during winter gales the Coast Pilot notifies mariners as follows:

"In winter, anchor far enough out to put to sea when a southeaster comes up; during a protracted gale in December, 1851, a terrible sea rolled in so that no vessel could have ridden out.

"The old steamer Seagull was driven northward, and lost two weeks in regaining her position, and the mail steamer Columbia hardly held her own for many hours off Orford Reef."

In the fall of 1872 Major H. M. Robert, Corps of Engineers, made a careful examination of this harbor, and in January, 1873, presented an elaborate report, with plans and estimates for a breakwater. In the summer of 1876 the board of engineers for the Pacific coast made a similar examination, and in February, 1877, presented a report, with a plan and estimates; these very interesting reports were laid before Congress, and to them I respectfully call attention for details.

Conclusions.

After a careful examination of this subject I beg to report that, in my opinion, Port Orford is a very available point for a harbor of refuge. It is easily accessible, occupies a position nearly midway between San Francisco and the strait of Fuca, presents a deep and capacious roadstead, offering secure anchorage from gales from all points except south, southeast, and southwest; is not subjected to northwest fogs, has no shifting sandbars or hidden reefs within its limits; the land around is high and prominent, and presents all the necessary materials, easily accessible, for a stone breakwater. All that is now needed to make it a secure harbor of refuge at all seasons is a breakwater, behind which vessels can ride safely at anchor during gales coming from the southeast, south, and southwest, from which it is not already protected by nature.

A careful examination of the chart of the currents and the general direction of the gales leads me to the conclusion that a breakwater about 5,000 feet long, running from the outer point of the head toward Coal Point, would give ample protection to a large fleet during the heaviest gales; for present purposes 2,000 feet would be sufficient, and this could be extended whenever it became necessary.

A breakwater 5,000 feet long would secure a harbor of about 300 acres, with a depth of from 4 to 12 fathoms outside the three-fathom curve, while one of 2,000 feet in length would secure an available anchorage of about 90 acres with the same depth.

The plan of breakwater recommended is that proposed by the board of engineers for the Pacific Coast and described in their report of February 14, 1877, as follows:

"We propose to build the base of any breakwater up to the height of 15 feet below the level of low water of small stone, that is to say, of such stone as any quarry will furnish, and while quarrying out this great mass to lay away all large stones of 5, 10, or 20 tons for the construction of that portion of the breakwater from 15 feet up to low water. Upon this foundation we propose to build a masonry wall, faced with granite, 25 feet wide and 20 feet high, including the foundation, protecting the seaward side by blocks of artificial stone (if natural stone cannot be obtained) of large size, (20 to 30 tons each,) and thoroughly paving the harbor side with large blocks of granite to receive without displacement the water that will be thrown over the wall in great storms."

I think this breakwater should be connected with the headland, and that the United States should purchase so much of the Head as will be necessary for works of defense after the harbor is completed, and for stone-quarries, buildings, &c., for the construction of the breakwater.

The proposed breakwater of 5,000 feet is estimated to cost as follows:

108,333⅓ cubic yards of ashlar masonry, at $18	$1, 950, 000
70, 000 cubic yards of rubble masonry, at $9	630, 000
295,000 cubic yards large stone, at $5	1, 475, 000
2,247,500 cubic yards small stone, at $2	4, 495, 000
Contingencies, 10 per cent	855, 000
Total	9, 405, 000

A breakwater 2,000 feet long is estimated to cost as follows:

43,333⅓ cubic yards ashlar masonry, at $18	$780, 000
28,000 cubic yards rubble masonry, at $9	252, 000
118,000 cubic yards large stone, at $5	590, 000
747,000 cubic yards small stone, at $2	1, 494, 000
Contingencies, 10 per cent	311, 000

Gales.

The prevailing winds on the coast from November until April are from the south and southwest; in May they veer around to the north and northwest and continue from that direction until about October; the gales most dreaded by mariners are from the southwest and are at times fearful in their severity; on the whole of this northwest coast between San Francisco and the strait of Fuca, a distance of 750 miles, there is no harbor that a sailing-vessel will attempt to enter during a heavy southwest gale.

A harbor of refuge is absolutely necessary, and nature seems to have indicated that Port Orford by its location and natural advantages should be selected for man to complete, and thus present a safe harbor to which mariners can run for shelter in any gale.

Port Orford is in the collection district of Southern Oregon; it is no longer a port of entry. In the range of hills in rear of the harbor there is said to be an inexhaustible supply of coal, and between the town and the Coquille River there are forests of the best cedar timber.

The nearest port of entry to Port Orford is at Ellensburgh at the mouth of Rogue River, about 25 miles south of the harbor. I was unable to learn what, if any, revenue was collected at Ellensburgh during the last fiscal year.

The nearest light-house is on Cape Blanco, 7 miles distant, and the nearest works of defense are at the mouth of the Columbia River, about 220 miles distant.

Since completing the foregoing I have received a very able and interesting communication from Captain William Tichenor, an experienced sailor and old resident of Port Orford, upon the great stream setting from the Japanese Islands northeast to the northwest coast of America, and its effects and changes on our shore line in eddies, shoals, drift-sands, &c. Captain Tichenor has gone into the whole subject, and gives his opinions as to the effects upon our coast from Cape Mendocino to the strait of Fuca, and particularly at Port Orford. I quote from the closing portion of his letter as follows:

"Port Orford has the following advantages: it is the central point between San Francisco and Puget Sound; it is the most western harbor on the coast, and it is therefore not liable to calms; it is exempt at all times from black fogs, and it is very seldom visited by gray or calm fogs; it is the most capacious roadstead upon the coast, and large enough to accommodate our rapidly growing commerce for all time to come; it is exempt from all sunken dangers, either in it or its approach; it is shielded from all danger of being filled with drifting sands; it has the very best holding-ground of any roadstead upon the coast, composed of sand, loam, and decomposed slate; it affords immediately at hand all the material, and of excellent quality, for any improvement desired.

"Its approaches are unsurpassed, having on the east of the harbor a prominent sugar-loaf mountain of eighteen hundred feet altitude, laved by the waters of the bay, and four miles east of this mountain another, with an altitude of twenty-three hundred feet, thus presenting to the navigator landmarks that cannot be mistaken in approaching the shore. The country in the interior is undoubtedly as rich in resources as any other portion of our coast, with inexhaustible deposits of coal, iron, copper, silver, and gold, extensive bodies of timber, and fertile valleys, all teeming with nature's riches, but, like the major portion of our iron-bound coast, destitute of a place of shipment.

"At the same time, important as are these internal resources, they should be considered but secondary to the great commercial demand for a port of refuge for the safety of the lives and property engaged in our coast traffic. We have only to refer to the sad detail of the sacrifice of life and property during the last winter, to raise our voice in prayer to the Government to look to our safety. All shipmasters on this coast, those commanding our magnificent steamers as well as sailing-vessels, unite in recommending Port Orford as the place adapted for an improvement of this kind."

A chart of Port Orford, showing proposed breakwater and the direction of the heaviest seas and currents, is transmitted.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN M. WILSON,
Major of Engineers, Brevet Colonel U. S. A.

Brigadier-General A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers, U. S. A.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it quite desirable to the public interest that there should be a short executive session, after which the doors can be again opened, and we can proceed to whatever legislative business there is. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. WINDOM. It is the understanding that the doors will be opened again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to appeal to the Senator from West Virginia. If it would be quite as convenient for him to address the Senate on some future day, I should be very glad indeed to have his consent to the consideration and passage of the Indian appropriation bill this afternoon.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is that bill ready?

Mr. WINDOM. It is now ready for action, and I should like to have the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The appropriation bills are considered privileged questions, and they are of a great deal more importance than what I might have to say. I presume it would be proper for me to give way, though I am prepared to go on with what few remarks I have to submit. I therefore yield to the Senator from Minnesota, and will allow the Indian appropriation bill to be taken up.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President, before the holidays I gave notice that on this day I should move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 855, for the relief of Warren Mitchell; but as there is an appropriation bill ready for action, I shall postpone that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The business before the Senate is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the bill for the revision of the patent laws be informally laid aside, and I will say to the Senate that I think the Indian appropriation bill will occupy but very little time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota that the bill for the revision of the patent laws be laid aside without prejudice?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I object to it, Mr. President. I feel compelled to object to it.

Mr. WINDOM. I move, then, that it be laid aside——

Mr. WADLEIGH. I can only yield to the expressed wish of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the unfinished business and all prior orders be postponed and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Rather than have that order passed I think I will accept the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota. I yield to the Indian appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent the unfinished business is laid aside without prejudice for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I give notice that on Monday I shall ask the Chair to recognize me after the morning business is concluded, so that I may submit the remarks I intended to submit to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator at that time.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the Secretary proceeds to read the bill, I ask leave to make a very brief statement in reference to the action of the Senate Committee on Appropriations upon it.

The bill as it passed the House appropriates $4,681,278.58. The total estimates were $4,933,244.20. It will be observed that the House has substantially conformed to the estimates. The total of the act for 1879 was $4,746,275.70. The net additions made by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate are $58,757.25, and embrace the following items:

For the northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes, $2,500.

For the Sioux of different tribes, $23,400. In both of these cases the amount was increased by the Committee on Appropriations to conform to the number of Indians as stated in the House bill. The treaties allowing a certain amount for each roaming Indian and for each Indian engaged in agriculture, the House state the number, but the amount is not appropriated according to the number and the amount named in the treaty, and the Senate committee have simply complied with Daboll and the treaty.

For the Tonkawa Indians at Fort Griffin, Texas, the committee have added $37,291.

For the pay of Indian police the committee have added $29,400. I will explain that item when it is reached in the reading of the bill, if it is desired.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will now be reported at length.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the amendments be acted on as the reading proceeds. There are but very few amendments proposed to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the bill, and the amendments of the committee will be acted on as they are reached in regular order in the reading.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, line 8, before the word "agents," to strike out "seventy-four" and insert "seventy-one;" so as to make the clause read:

For pay of seventy-one agents of Indian affairs at the following-named agencies at the rates respectively indicated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 592, under the head of "Miamies of Kansas," to diminish the appropriation "for permanent provision for blacksmith and assistant, and iron and steel for shop, per fifth article of treaty of October 6, 1818, and fourth article of treaty of June 5, 1854," from $411.43 to $348.20.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 597, to decrease the appropriation "for permanent provision for miller, in lieu of gunsmith, per same articles and treaties, and per fifth article of treaty of October 23, 1834," from $262.62 to $222.26.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 603, to decrease the appropriation "for interest on $21,884.81, at 5 per cent., for educational purposes, per third article of treaty of June 5, 1854," from $1,094.24 to $926.08.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 608, to decrease the total appropriation for these Indians from $5,051.01 to $4,779.26.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 707, under the head of "Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes," to increase the appropriation "for first of ten installments, to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior for each Indian engaged in agriculture (one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five Indians) in the purchase of such articles as from time to time the condition and necessities of the Indians may indicate to be proper, as per sixth article of treaty of May 10, 1868," from $35,000 to $37,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 714, to increase the total appropriation for these Indians from $53,000 to $55,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 1039, under the head of "Sioux of different tribes, including Santee Sioux of Nebraska," to increase the appropriation "for tenth of thirty installments, to purchase such articles as may be considered proper by the Secretary of the Interior, for twenty-one thousand persons roaming; and for tenth of thirty installments, to purchase such articles as may be considered proper by the Secretary of the Interior, for one thousand four hundred and twenty persons engaged in agriculture," from $215,000 to $238,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1064, to increase the total appropriation for these Indians from $1,483,900 to $1,507,300.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I should like to have the Secretary read again from line 1051 to 1059.

The Secretary read the clause from lines 1053 to 1059 inclusive.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That does not make sense. It seems to have been wrongly printed in some way. It says "Spotted Tail Sioux Indians from them February 19, 1867," and lines 1056 and 1057 should be stricken out, and then it would read: "From the Missouri River and Sidney, Nebraska, or Cheyenne, Wyoming;" and after "Wyoming" the words "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior" should be inserted. It would then make sense. I move that that alteration be made. It is evidently a misprint as the bill is, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) The bill will be corrected accordingly, there being no objection.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1278, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

And the President of the United States is hereby directed to prohibit the removal of any portion of said tribes of Indians to the Indian Territory unless the same shall be hereafter authorized by act of Congress.

So as to make the clause read:

Collecting and subsisting Apache and other Indians of Arizona and New Mexico: For this amount, to subsist and properly care for the Apache and other Indians in Arizona and New Mexico who have been or may be collected on reservations in New Mexico or Arizona, $320,000.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I move to non-concur with the Appropriations Committee in the amendment just reported. I have so often explained my reasons to the Senate for opposition to the introduction of wild tribes among the civilized tribes in the Indian Territory that I will not repeat that argument. I have only to say that the five civilized tribes occupying the Indian Territory are in a condition of peace, of progress, and of comparative prosperity; that in my judgment it is exceedingly injurious to those tribes and their advancement, as well as to the surrounding States of Kansas, Arkansas, and Texas, that wild tribes should be moved in among them. For these reasons I move to non-concur, and I hope the Senate will sustain the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, which is to strike out the words that have been read.

Mr. WINDOM. A single word in reply. There is no law now, as I understand it, authorizing wild Indians to be removed into that Territory. The treaty with the Cherokee Indians and the others resident there permitted friendly Indians who are civilized to be brought there; but I think there is no law now authorizing wild Indians to be removed to that Territory, so that the provision which the House propose to insert, and which is important legislation, is not necessary.

Mr. COCKRELL. Have they not already been taking these wild Indians there and putting them there without any authority of law?

Mr. WINDOM. I am not aware that they have. There is certainly no law for it that I have found yet.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no law for it, but they have been doing it all the time.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope the Senate will agree to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MAXEY. My motion was to non-concur in it.

Mr. PLUMB. I cannot at present call attention to the law under which it has been done, and it may be as the Senator from Minnesota says that there is no law for it, but it is one of those things which we understand to have been done and repeatedly done—I mean the transportation and location of wild and hostile tribes of Indians in the Indian Territory. An evidence of that is that which is well known to all members on this floor, the raid made by the Cheyennes through the western portion of Kansas and Nebraska last year—a very destructive raid in which some forty or fifty men were killed and a very large number of women ravished and other outrages committed. It is against incursions of this kind that the surrounding States seek to protect themselves by providing specifically that the President shall not under any circumstances place Indians within that Territory without the consent of Congress to it having been obtained.

If it be true, as the Senator from Minnesota says, that the law would remain without this clause of the House bill precisely as it is now, certainly the most that can be said about this provision would be that it would be a matter of extra precaution; it could do no hurt; and in view of the action that has been heretofore taken by the President, or by the Interior Department representing him, in placing Indians in that Territory, I think it is entirely proper and absolutely necessary in point of fact that a provision of this kind should be enacted. If there can be nothing more said against it than that it is merely superfluous, that ought not to weigh against what we know has taken place heretofore.

Mr. MAXEY. It is true, as stated by the Senator from Minnesota, that the various treaties with all the five tribes authorize the introduction of friendly Indians among them by the consent of the nations. It is true that there is no law which authorizes the introduction of wild or savage tribes among those people. It is a fact, most unfortunately, however, that such have been introduced among that people. Now, I want a prohibition there that cannot be mistaken; and the House has acted on that idea and has placed that prohibition in the bill, and I ask the Senate to support them in it. The Senator from Minnesota cannot know, as I know and as gentlemen who surround that Indian Territory know, the great evil to the people of that Territory as well as to the surrounding States, and the necessary interest which we feel in the sustainment of the position taken by the House and non-concurrence with the amendment of the Senate Committee on Appropriations to strike it out.

Mr. WINDOM. The only prohibition which the proposition of the House makes is against the removal of "Apaches and other Indians of Arizona and New Mexico" into that Territory. Now, if there are any civilized Indians there friendly to the Indians in the Indian Territory, whom those now occupying the Territory are willing to receive, I think they ought not to be prohibited; and as that is the present condition of the law, I think the provision is more than superfluous. I think it forbids the removal of Indians who ought to be removed there. As matters now stand, to state myself a little more clearly, no Indians can be removed there, as I understand, unless they be civilized and friendly and have the consent of the Indians in the Indian Territory. If that be true, I think we ought not to prohibit that class of Indians from being removed there.

Mr. DORSEY. That is not true, except to a degree. Under the original treaties with the five or six tribes of Indians who occupy that country it was provided that no Indian should be removed there except friendly Indians, with the consent of those tribes; but since that time the United States have bought of those several tribes of Indians a large part of that territory, and may now remove there Indians of any class, without regard to the wishes of the Indians occupying the other part of the Territory. In that way the northern Cheyennes were moved down from Nebraska or Dakota, and kept there surrounded for a time by soldiers; and as soon as the soldiers were removed they broke through the country and passed through the States of Kansas and Nebraska, committing murder, rapine, and devastation wherever they went. It is to prevent that that the surrounding States to that Territory enter a protest against action such as this, striking out a provision to prevent the removal of Indians from Arizona and New Mexico to that Territory.

There are no friendly Indians in Arizona and New Mexico that want to be removed. The only friendly Indians there are the Pueblos that never remove from the place where they live. They own their land and cultivate their farms. The other Indians are the Apaches and the Navajoes and the Utes. They are wild, savage Indians, and have committed probably more murders than any other similar number of Indians in this country.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to state if it is not true that the Apaches are among the very worst of the savages we have ever had on that frontier?

Mr. DORSEY. I was just remarking that those Indians have committed more murders and outrages than any similar number of Indians in this whole country. They are now located on a reservation in Arizona where they have always lived, where they belong, surrounded by the military now upon that reservation, and a number of forts have been built at great expense to secure them. To take those Indians from that distant country and remove them to the Indian Territory would be an outrage on the people surrounding that Territory.

I hope that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the words which have been read.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word on this question. I know of no intention or purpose anywhere at present to remove any portion of these tribes to the Indian Territory; at least I have heard of none. Has the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. DORSEY. I do not know that I can state that any communication of that sort has been made to me officially; but I know that the Commissioner who has charge of this branch of the public business has over and over again on many occasions said that he thought it was the duty of this country to remove all the wild Indians into the Indian Territory. I know that that in his mind is a settled conviction.

Mr. ALLISON. There are a great many people who believe it would be a wise thing to collect the Indians upon a smaller number of reservations than they now occupy, and thus open up to the settlement and occupation of white people and civilized people a portion of their present reservations. Now under the treaties made with the civilized tribes, so called, I understand that friendly Indians may go into the Indian Territory by agreement with the civilized tribes, without the interference of Congress, or without an act of Congress, it requiring only the approval of the President of the United States. If we have made such treaties with the Cherokees and the other civilized tribes as will justify them in making arrangements with those Indians, I do not see why Congress should interfere.

Mr. DORSEY. The intention, I think, of that treaty was to permit these Indians, the Cherokees, Choctaws, &c., to amalgamate with any other tribe of Indians they saw fit to amalgamate with, and let those other Indians go in there and live with them. That is not a question of removal at all; that is simply a matter of arrangement between two separate tribes of Indians.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand the treaty, by article 15 any friendly tribe of Indians may unite with those civilized tribes east of the ninety-sixth meridian.

Mr. DORSEY. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. And any other friendly tribe may be located there west of the ninety-sixth meridian with the approval of the President of the United States. It seems to me that it is hardly wise to require in advance the action of Congress to justify or authorize this removal. This Indian Territory is an immense domain, and I understand is unoccupied to a large degree west of 98°, and it seems to me if any of the tribes that are now occupying New Mexico desire to remove permanently to the Indian Territory they ought to have under this treaty the privilege of doing so; and if that should be found to be wise and expedient it seems to me that we ought not to put upon our statute-books a law which will prevent its consummation until such time as Congress can legislate upon the subject. Therefore I think this provision ought to be stricken out. I think we can trust the President of the United States not unnecessarily to interfere with these treaty provisions or with the rights of the Indians now occupying that Territory, or with the feelings of the adjacent States.

Mr. DORSEY. I am very sure that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs does not wish to mislead the Senate on one important point; but his remarks leave the impression that the several tribes of Indians must give their consent before any other tribes can be removed into that Territory. That does not apply to all of that country west of the ninety-eighth meridian. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the executive authority of this Government can remove anybody they see fit, or any tribe they see fit that they have control of, into the country west of the ninety-eighth meridian, without regard to the civilized tribes living east of that line.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, in my judgment this provision as it came from the House of Representatives should not only be retained, but its terms should be so enlarged as to prevent the removal of any Indians whatever to the Indian Territory without direct authority by act of Congress. The Senator from Minnesota states that there is now no law authorizing the President to remove unfriendly Indians into the limits of the Indian Territory. But whether that is so or not, if the Senator from Minnesota is not aware of the fact, everybody else is, that during the past six years the process has been gradually going on of concentrating all the unfriendly Indians within these limits whenever they become dangerous in the localities where they have been residing. I need only refer for illustration to the Modocs. When they committed the outrages that became historical, as soon as they were conquered they were removed by order of the Executive, without any sanction or authority on the part of Congress, into the Indian Territory. So with the northern Cheyennes and various other bands that I might name that have been from time to time located there with the design of carrying out what I believe to be a fixed purpose to consolidate all Indians within that portion of our country known as the Indian Territory.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa states that in his judgment this is a matter that concerns solely the Indians who made these treaties under which this region is occupied. It is easy for him, living in a State that is not exposed to the dangers of Indian depredation, to reason philosophically upon the subject; but there are three great communities surrounding that Territory, Texas and Arkansas and Kansas, that have very material interests at stake, and that have at least as good right to be considered as the civilized Indians living within the limits of that Territory.

In September last, in consequence of the unauthorized location of the northern Cheyennes within the Indian Territory, depredations were committed in Kansas that rivaled all the savage atrocities that were ever committed in colonial America. Not less than thirty citizens of Kansas, unarmed, unoffending, attending to peaceful pursuits, were deliberately massacred in cold blood by these barbarians who had been placed there against their wishes, against their protest, by the Executive Department, without the authority or sanction of Congress. More atrocities, more wrongs, more outrages, were committed than could be atoned for by the utter extirpation and annihilation of every Indian on the continent. Property to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars was destroyed or stolen, innocent women and children were brutally murdered, houses, grain, all the products of industry, were wantonly destroyed by fire. And now, when we ask that we may be protected against further injuries resulting from this unauthorized policy, we are met by the statement that there is now no law which requires the Administration to do the acts of which we complain, and that therefore such a provision is superfluous.

I trust, Mr. President, that this provision will not only be agreed to by the Senate as it came from the House, but that it will be enlarged; and at the proper time I shall move to so amend it as to prevent the removal of any Indians hereafter into the Indian Territory without the direct authority and sanction of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, to strike out the clause which has been reported.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 7.

Mr. INGALLS. We had better have the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, I wish to make one remark before the vote is taken on this amendment. If I understand the policy of the present Administration, it is not, as has been stated by one of the Senators who has spoken, to concentrate all the Indians in the Indian Territory, but to place them on fewer reservations than they now occupy. As I understand, we have now seventy-odd agencies in the United States, and troops are required at almost every one of these agencies to protect the Indians, not only one tribe from another, but to protect the whites from the Indians. It is asserted by the Senator from Arkansas that troops are already required to protect the Indians in New Mexico. The same troops could much more easily protect, in addition to the Indians that are already there, other Indians concentrated on a reservation than they could protect them where they are separated.

The great mistake, it appears to me, that is being now made on this subject is that with our present small Army we have to scatter the troops over the country, so that there are only a very few at any one point. Look, if you please, at the Cheyenne war, if you may call it a war—I refer to the effort made by the Cheyennes to get away from the Territory only a short time ago. The Indians passed from their country through Kansas and through Nebraska and up into the northern Territories, while there were not troops enough on the right or on the left of them, within striking distance, to stop their progress. We have not troops enough now, and that is the trouble. Instead of the same troops being scattered as they are now, a part of them engaged in protecting members of the same tribes in the Indian Territory, while part of them are protecting others in New Mexico, we should put the Indians together if they want to go together; and the same number of troops would certainly answer for all the Indians that now answer for only a part of them. In that way we could save much expense to the Government. I can see no good reason why, if the Indians want to go there and the Indians of that Territory want them to come, (and that has to be agreed upon before they can be removed,) they should not be removed. I believe there are now thirty-odd tribes in the Indian Territory and there is room for thirty more of the same size. The country is useless to us as it now stands, and if the Indians want to go there and go to work and become civil, or if they can be even kept better and cheaper there, we ought to remove them. I think that the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations ought to be agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Nebraska seems to intimate or endeavor to leave the impression that the Indians who have been removed to the Territory went there because they desired to do so. Nothing could be more inaccurate. Take the case of the Nez Percés. After having revolted in the Northwest they were captured and taken to Fort Leavenworth. They desired to be returned to their original reservation. Their request was refused, and they were sent to the Territory against their wishes and over their protest; and they are to-day rapidly becoming exterminated from climatic influences and from the want of proper medicine and food.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him if it was not Congress in place of the Administration that sent them down there?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; it was not Congress.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, sir; I understand that it was.

Mr. INGALLS. It was by an order of the Executive, without sanction of law.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I certainly am more mistaken than I ever was in my life if we did not pass an act here authorizing those Indians to be sent to the Indian Territory. I remember opposing it myself at the time, and I know that I was outvoted and the bill was carried and they were sent down there.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is mistaken. There never was any act passed authorizing the removal of the Nez Percés to the Indian Territory. It was an inhuman and an outrageous act; and the result of it has been that in consequence of climatic influences largely, and through neglect and want of proper food, medicine, and clothing, those Indians, who had been the traditional friends of the white man for the greater part of a century, having been driven to revolt by the aggressions of their neighbors, were exiled and are now gradually being destroyed.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Over 25 per cent. of them have died.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is all true, and I was as much opposed to it as the Senator from Kansas; but nevertheless he will find himself mistaken. I have not the records at hand just now to refer to, but there was an act passed here within the last twelve months authorizing those same Indians to be taken from Fort Leavenworth and put in the Indian Territory. The Senator is evidently mistaken, because at that very time I rose and objected to it on the ground that they being from the north, if taken into the humid atmosphere of the south, would die; and they are dying. I have seen those Indians since myself, and know that what the Senator cites is true, that 25 per cent. of them are already in their graves. I speak of that because if the amendment provided for Indians coming from a northern district or country going into the Indian Territory I should oppose it; but these Indians that we are talking about now live in a southern country and are adapted and suited to that kind of climate.

Therefore I have no objection to their removal to the Indian Territory, while I did have great objection to the removal of northern Indians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment reported from the Committee on Appropriations, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 32; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGALLS. I now move to amend the bill, in line 1280, by striking out from the clause as it came from the House the words "portion of said tribes of;" so as to read:

And the President of the United States is hereby directed to prohibit the removal of any Indians to the Indian Territory unless the same shall be hereafter authorized by act of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. WINDOM. I shall not debate the question. I only hope the Senate will do no such thing; but from the expression just given I think they are disposed to vacate the Indian Territory.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 13, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONKLING. The yeas and nays are to be demanded, I suppose, and I rise to ask that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. At the suggestion of some friends of the bill as it came from the House, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas is withdrawn and the Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1301, to increase the appropriation "for the support of the Tonkawa Indians at Fort Griffin, Texas," from $2,000 to $5,729.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1352, after the word "pay," to strike out "and expenses of detectives" and insert "of employés;" so as to make the clause read:

Incidental expenses of Indian service in Montana: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, including pay of employés, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1399, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "eight;" in line 1400, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "fifty" and insert "one hundred;" and in line 1404, after the word "reservations," to strike out "thirty thousand six hundred" and insert "sixty thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

Pay of Indian police:
For the services of not exceeding eight hundred privates at $5 per month each, and not exceeding one hundred officers at $8 per month each, of Indian police, and for equipments, to be employed in maintaining order and prohibiting illegal traffic in liquor on the several Indian reservations, $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded. The last amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the clause from line 7 to line 13 of section 6, in the following words:

And the Secretary of the Interior, under the direction of the President, may use any surplus that may remain in any of the said appropriations herein made for the purchase of subsistence for the several Indian tribes, to supply any subsistence deficiency that may occur for any tribe: Provided, however, That funds appropriated to fulfill treaty obligations shall not be so used.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read a third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask leave to withdraw the motion I entered this morning to reconsider the vote of the Senate adjourning over to Monday.

Mr. BURCHARD. I think it would be well to add to that——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BRIGHT. I demand the regular order.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twenty-five minutes past twelve o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee on the Judiciary.

MISSOURI WAR CLAIM.

Mr. EDEN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 1409) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to examine the evidence of payments made by the State of Missouri since April 17, 1866, to the officers and privates of the militia forces of said State, for military services actually performed in the suppression of the rebellion, in full concert and co-operation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their orders, and to make report thereof to Congress.

The preamble and bill were read, as follows:

Whereas it is claimed by the State of Missouri that at the time of the reimbursement of said State under and by virtue of the act of Congress entitled "An act to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion," approved April 17, 1866, there still remained a large amount due to the officers and privates of said militia forces, which had not then been paid by said State, and was not therefore included in said reimbursements, and that said State has since paid said amounts to said officers and privates of said militia forces, and has never been reimbursed: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to investigate, consider, and examine the evidence, vouchers, and records relating to the payments claimed to have been made by the State of Missouri since the 17th day of April, 1866, to the officers and privates of the militia forces of said State for military services actually performed in the suppression of the rebellion in full concert and co-operation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their orders, which are now on file in his Department and which may be filed by said State or its agent or agents, and to report to Congress at the earliest practicable time the results of such investigation and examination, and the amount or amounts, if any, which shall appear to be justly due to said State for such payments made since April 17, 1866.

Mr. EDEN. As that bill makes no appropriation, Mr. Speaker, if there is no objection, I will ask that it now be put on its passage.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BALAAM A. BRIDGES.

Mr. EDEN also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 969, a bill (H. R. No. 5798) for the relief of Balaam A. Bridges, of Bartow County, Georgia; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the sum of $72.06 be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay Balaam A. Bridges, of Bartow County, for work done by him on the Western and Atlantic Railroad in the State of Georgia, during the months of August, September, and October, in the year 1864, while said railroad was in the hands of the United States military authorities.

Mr. EDEN. As that is simply to pay a laborer the small amount that the Quartermaster-General says is due him, I ask the bill be put on its passage if there be no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOPHIA B. MOORE.

Mr. REILLY, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5799) for the relief of Sophia B. Moore, of New Berne, North Carolina; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Court of Claims to grant a rehearing in the case of Sophia B. Moore vs. The United States, No. 3446 of said court, with full power and jurisdiction to hear and determine and make judgment for the proceeds of the rosin and turpentine claimed to have been seized by the United States officers at the capture of New Berne in March, 1862, and belonging to William B. Moore, jr., which rosin and turpentine are claimed to have been taken to Philadelphia and libeled and sold by the marshal of the eastern district of Pennsylvania under the direction of the Federal court and the proceeds thereof deposited in the Treasury of the United States; provided that the act shall not be construed to have any effect or operation beyond the case therein specially named.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report in that case be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Sophia B. Moore, of New Berne, North Carolina, submit the following report:

Upon the capture of New Berne, in March, 1862, by the Union forces, there was seized by them a large quantity of personal property, consisting of rosin, turpentine, tar, lumber, &c., belonging to the citizens of that city, which was shipped, under the direction of Commodore Rowan, to New York and Philadelphia, where the several cargoes were proceeded against in the admiralty courts of the respective districts, and under the decrees of said courts the property was sold and the proceeds held to await the final decrees of the courts.

The owners appearing as claimants in the New York court, the proceeds of those shipments were, by the decree of that court, turned over to such claimants. No claimants appearing in the Philadelphia court, it was, in May, 1864, decreed by said court that whereas the property so seized was not lawful subject of prize of war, but was captured property under the provisions of the act of March 12, 1863, that the proceeds of such property, after deducting all expenses, and amounting to $44,313.62, be turned into the United States Treasury, where it was placed to the credit of the captured and abandoned property fund.

This fund being in the nature of a trust fund as declared by the Supreme Court for the benefit of the owners thereof, under the provisions of the several acts of Congress relating thereto, has been held separate and apart from other moneys of the Government, and only subject to the claims of the lawful owners thereof established by legal authority, and so far as this committee are advised no portion of this particular part of such fund placed therein under the decree of said court has ever been disbursed.

Among the articles so seized were two thousand barrels of rosin and fifty casks of turpentine belonging to William P. Moore, jr., and brother of the memorialist, who afterward died, leaving the memorialist his sole legatee, she taking upon herself the support of her widowed mother. The net proceeds of this property as included in the decree of said court was $15,270.

The memorialist, by her guardian, she then being a minor, instituted suit in the Court of Claims for such proceeds under the provisions of the act of March 12, 1863, and although the court unanimously found the facts to be as stated, yet a majority of said court held as a matter of law that the act of March, 1863, was not retroactive in its operation, and therefore that the court had no jurisdiction in the premises.

It seems to your committee that the case comes within the spirit of the several acts of Congress relating to captured and abandoned property, if not within the letter, and as the court has established the justice of the case in favor of the memorialist, which facts as found by said court are fully sustained by the proofs, this committee deem it advisable, inasmuch as the Court of Claims has in its files the evidence upon which the former judgment was rendered and may hear any additional evidence that may be adduced by either party, that the court should retain the control of said matter for the purpose of adjudication, with complete jurisdiction thereof, therefore for the purpose of correcting the technical want of jurisdiction in said court report the accompanying bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REILLY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A. L. SHOTWELL.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2312) for the relief of A. L. Shotwell, of Jefferson County, Kentucky; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. JULIA ELLIOTT.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5800) for the relief of Mrs. Julia Elliott, widow and administratrix of Newell D. Elliott, deceased; which was read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the petition, claim, and papers of Mrs. Julia Elliott, widow and administratrix of Newell D. Elliott, deceased, late of the city of Memphis, Shelby County, State of Tennessee, relative to the taking, appropriating, and use of two hundred and six hogsheads of sugar and one hundred and twenty-seven and one-half barrels of molasses by the military authorities of the United States in the year 1862, in the city of Memphis, county of Shelby, State of Tennessee, be referred back to the commissioners of claims for re-examination and report; and the said commissioners of claims shall have full jurisdiction and authority to reopen, examine, and consider this case, and to make report thereon to Congress as in cases provided for in the second section of the act authorizing the appointment of the said commissioners, approved March 3, 1871; and that the evidence on file with the Committee on War Claims of the House of Representatives with her claim shall be received and considered by the commissioners of claims the same as if it had been taken by them orally.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM M. KENDALL.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 605) for the relief of William M. Kendall.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to William M. Kendall, of Plymouth, in the State of Indiana, who was commissioned by the governor of said State on the 1st day of September, 1864, major in the Seventy-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers, vice Alfred B. Wade, promoted, the pay and allowances of a major from said date until the 16th day of May, 1865, when he was mustered in as such major, he having been a prisoner of war in the interval, deducting therefrom whatever pay and allowances he received as a captain for the same period; and said payment shall be made from any money appropriated for the pay of the Army.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

D. W. M'CLUNG.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1827) for the relief of D. W. McClung, of Woodsdale, Butler County, Ohio.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay D. W. McClung, of Woodsdale, Butler County, Ohio, late a captain and assistant quartermaster of United States volunteers, the amount of pay and allowances of a regimental quartermaster from the 26th day of April, 1861, to the 21st day of March, 1862.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE F. BROTT.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5801) for the relief of George F. Brott; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY LACHMAN.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5802) for the relief of Henry Lachman; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Let the report be read.

The report was read.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point of order that the bill contains an appropriation, and that it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am very certain if the gentleman from Wisconsin understood the merits of the case he would withdraw his objection.

Mr. BRAGG. I examined it once as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs which rejected the claim.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. JOHNSON AND J. R. FRANCIS.

Mr. THOMPSON also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1904, a bill (H. R. No. 5803) for the relief of William Johnson and John R. Francis, of Edgar County, Illinois; which was read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $2,440.90 to William Johnson and John R. Francis, of Edgar County, Illinois, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be in full compensation for all property taken from or furnished by them, or either of them, to or by the United States military authorities during the war.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MYRA CLARK GAINES.

Mr. GUNTER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5804) for the relief Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TITLE TO LAND IN BURLINGTON, IOWA.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 4186) confirming and vesting the title to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa, in the "independent school district of said city."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I should like to have that bill put upon its passage at once.

The bill was read. It provides that the act entitled "An act confirming the title to a tract of land in Burlington, Iowa," approved July 4, 1868, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

That all the title of the United States in and to a certain tract of land in the city of Burlington, Des Moines County, in the State of Iowa, described as being west of lot number 978 in said city, south of Valley street, east of Boundary street, and north of Market street, and which was originally reserved from sale by the United States and dedicated to public burial purposes, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to and vested in the "independent school district" of said city, to be forever dedicated to and used by said school district for public-school purposes, and for no other purpose whatsoever.

The amendment reported by the committee was to insert before the enacting clause of the bill the following preamble:

Whereas it is claimed that the word "west," after the words "Valley street," in the "act confirming the title to a tract of land in the city of Burlington, Iowa," approved July 4, 1868, (volume 15, page 82, United States Statutes at Large,) is a clerical error, and that the word "east" should be inserted in lieu thereof: Therefore in order to properly confirm the title to the lot which was intended to be confirmed by said act.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The amendment explains the purpose of the bill. It is simply to make a correction in the description of the lot.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESITA JUANA LOPEZ GRANT, NEW MEXICO.

Mr. McGOWAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3992) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico.

The bill was read. It provides that the private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico known as the Mesita Juana Lopez grant, made by the Spanish government January 18, 1782, examined, approved, and recommended for confirmation by the surveyor-general of New Mexico, November 29, 1872, designated as private land claim No. 64, and duly surveyed by the United States, the field-notes of the survey and plat being approved by the surveyor-general of New Mexico on February 28, 1877, shall be confirmed; provided that the foregoing confirmation shall only be construed as a quitclaim or relinquishment of all title or claim on the part of the United States in and to said private land claim, and shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the same; nor shall the United States be liable to make compensation for any part of said land to which there are or may be any adverse rights or claim.

Mr. McGOWAN. I ask now that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3992) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico, would respectfully submit the following report:

It appears from the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico, as communicated to the House by the Secretary of the Interior on the 24th of January, 1873, that under the law of July 22, 1854, entitled "An act to establish the offices of surveyor-general of New Mexico," &c., said surveyor-general examined the claim set out in this bill and found in substance as follows:

First. That in the year 1782, the Spanish government of New Mexico granted in due form a tract of land, now known as the Mesita Juana Lopez grant, to these individuals, to wit, Domingo Romero, Miguel Ortiz, and Manuel Ortiz.

Second. That these parties took possession of said lands during said year 1782, and continued to occupy the same, themselves or their descendants, continuously down to the time of the said report, to wit, November 29, 1872.

Third. That the original papers which evidence the grant were produced and found to be in due form.

The claim has now been surveyed by the surveyor-general and the boundaries accurately determined, and the confirmation of the title in the claimants recommended.

A bill confirming the title to this claim with others was reported favorably to the House by the Committee on Private Land Claims in the Forty-fourth Congress, but failed to reach a vote.

Your committee have examined the evidence submitted in favor of the bill, and unanimously recommend the passage of the same.

Mr. McGOWAN. A bill precisely identical with this which has passed the Senate is now upon the Speaker's table and the Committee on Private Land Claims have reported unanimously in favor of the passage of this bill. I will therefore ask that Senate bill No. 9 be taken up and put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks that the bill (S. No. 9) identical in every respect with the bill reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims, unanimously, be taken up and put upon its passage.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan if this claim was not embraced in the bill which was before the last Congress, which covered all the Mexican claims?

Mr. McGOWAN. It was.

Mr. EDEN. I recollect that there was a good deal of discussion about that bill and that it did not pass.

Mr. McGOWAN. There is no doubt but that this individual claim was included in that bill. There was no objection to it.

Mr. EDEN. But I know no reason why this claim should be singled out and passed while others are not.

Mr. McGOWAN. Because there is no objection to this individual claim.

Mr. EDEN. What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. McGOWAN. About 44,000 acres. The bill protects the United States against any adverse claims to the land.

Mr. EDEN. Forty-four thousand acres is a large amount of land. I think it would be well that the matter be considered. It should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. McGOWAN. This is equivalent to a quitclaim of any right that the United States may have to this land.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman makes the objection that it takes land from the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. BUCKNER. That objection cannot lie against a bill of this kind, because the Government of the United States does not own the land.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order, and the Chair presumes that it is made against the proviso. The Chair will have the proviso read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the foregoing confirmation shall only be construed as a quitclaim or relinquishment of all title or claim on the part of the United States in and to said private land claim, and shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the same; nor shall the United States be liable to make compensation for any part of said land to which there are or may be any adverse rights or claim.

The SPEAKER. It is not the duty of the Chair to determine what title the United States may have to this land, or whether there is any title of the United States to it; but the language of the proviso would seem to imply that the Government has a title, and that this bill provides for a waiver of that title. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order, and the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MEDANO SPRINGS AND ZAPATO GRANT.

Mr. BICKNELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported adversely upon private land claim known as "the Medano Springs and Zapato grant," and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LAND TITLES IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. BICKNELL also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5805) to confirm certain land titles in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSÉ AND PABLO APIS.

Mr. DENISON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 854) for the adjudication of title to lands claimed by José Apis and Pablo Apis in the State of California.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the legal representatives, successors, or assignees of José Apis and Pablo Apis, or either of them, be, and they are hereby, permitted to file their claim and title to a certain tract of land in California known as La Iolla Rancho in and before the United States district court of California; and that said court shall have the same jurisdiction in all things, to be exercised originally, to hear and determine upon the said claim and title, and to confirm or reject the same, as the several district courts had under the act of Congress of March 3, 1851, and acts amendatory thereunto. And the Supreme Court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine said cause upon appeal, as decided in said acts: Provided, That no lands shall be confirmed to said claimants by said decree to which there are valid claims existing under the pre-emption, homestead, or other laws of the United States at the date of the passage of this act; nor shall any decree of confirmation affect any valid adverse right of any other person or persons, or give to the confirmees, or any of them, any claim upon the United States for compensation for any land such confirmees may lose by reason of pre-emption or homestead claims or adverse rights as aforesaid; and that no decree shall be rendered for more than two square leagues: Provided further, That said claimants, before filing their claim and title, shall execute releases to any persons who may be in possession of any portion of said lands under valid claims under the pre-emption, homestead, or other laws of the United States at the date of the passage of this act to the portions of said lands so held respectively; and before rendering a decree in confirmation the said court shall ascertain that said releases have been duly executed.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to hear the report read in this case. I do not know any reason why these parties cannot now go into the courts without this bill.

Mr. DENISON. The report is a very brief one.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred Senate bill No. 854 entitled "An act for the adjudication of title to lands claimed by José Apis and Pablo Apis, in the State of California," respectfully report that they have considered the same and recommend concurrence in its passage.

Mr. EDEN. That report does not give any reason for the bill. I will reserve any point of order upon the bill until I can hear some explanation.

Mr. DENISON. This case relates to about two leagues of land in the county of San Diego, State of California, which has been in controversy in Congress for a long time. It belonged formerly to a Spanish grant to a Spanish family. They were entirely ignorant of the English language, and before their claims were presented to the United States land commission the heads of the family died. That neglect grew out of the fact that they were ignorant of the English language, and never knew of the existence of the law under which they could present their claim until after the decease of the heads of the family.

The land still remains in the hands of the family and has never been contested by anybody. The proof is conclusive before the committee. The committee of the Senate were unanimous in their report, and the committee of the House after full consideration can see no reason why the bill should not pass. I will say further that every possible provision is made under the bill for the protection of all possible claimants.

Mr. EDEN. This bill permits the parties to go before the courts.

Mr. DENISON. Yes; but before they go there all possible rights are protected by the bill.

Mr. EDEN. Does any party represent the United States in that court? Does the bill provide that the United States shall be represented in that court?

Mr. GUNTER. The United States district attorney is bound to represent the Government in all these cases.

Mr. DENISON. I think there can be no objection to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is this a contest between individuals only, or does the United States in any respect have any title whatever to the land?

Mr. DENISON. There is no title in the United States and never was. This land was granted by a Spanish grant long before the United States acquired the territory.

Mr. EDEN. Unless this bill proposes that these parties shall bring a suit against the United States, I do not see any necessity for passing the bill. If the Spanish grant is not good, then the title to the land is in the Government of the United States. I understand the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. DENISON] states that there are no adverse claimants.

The SPEAKER. Provision is made by the bill for a release by these parties to all legal adverse claimants.

Mr. EDEN. Then, unless these parties are going to sue the United States, I do not see who is to be sued.

Mr. GUNTER. It is absolutely necessary under the treaties and laws as they now exist that parties claiming under these old Spanish grants shall establish the grant as being legal and one properly made by the Spanish authority. The object of this bill is to establish that fact, that the original Spanish grant was in accordance with the laws of Spain at the time the grant was made. The bill protects the title of all parties.

The SPEAKER. This bill, then, could not divest any title the United States has, from the fact that the United States has no title.

Mr. GUNTER. Of course not. It is only a method required under the treaties between the United States and Spain to establish the other title.

Mr. EDEN. If the Spanish grant be found to be invalid, then as a matter of course the title of the land would be in the Government of the United States.

Mr. MILLS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. MILLS. Then, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, this bill will go over until the next morning hour of Friday.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. BURCHARD in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

WILLIAM AND MARY COLLEGE.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending bill in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar is the bill (H. R. No. 189) to reimburse the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, for property destroyed during the late war.

Mr. BRIGHT. Before we enter upon the discussion of that bill, I would like to know what time remains for debate? I understand that there is some time unexhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate was limited by the House to three hours, if the Chair remembers correctly, one hour of which still remains. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I rise to make an inquiry. At the end of that hour will there be a vote on this bill? Is that the agreement?

The CHAIRMAN. That question will arise at the proper time. The Chair cannot now answer it.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BRIGHT. Before we proceed with the debate, I wish to say that there seems to be some misunderstanding as to the length of time which the discussion is to occupy. After the hour shall have been exhausted by the other side, will there remain an hour to be exhausted upon this side before the final vote?

The CHAIRMAN. That question will be decided when it arises.

Mr. BRIGHT. That is a matter we wish to have determined before the debate is proceeded with.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose that this discussion is not to come out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I think there has been no bill before Congress since I have had the honor of being a member of this body that has had so little substantial legal merit as this bill; and no subject discussed in Committee of the Whole within my recollection has had brought to its aid so much eloquence, so much rhetoric, so many appeals to the higher sentiments of our nature. Every member of this House who has in prospect the presentation of any one of the myriad of southern claims, as they are called, of all shades and casts and varieties, is prepared to advocate the passage of this bill, in public and in private, by all the means by which the passage of a bill should be urged. I find southern gentlemen urging the passage of this bill with undiminished zeal for six or seven long years, with a patience, a perseverance, and a fidelity unrivaled in the prosecution of any other measure before this House. I find northern men urging the passage of this bill as I believe against the known judgment and feelings and wishes of their entire constituency. I am unable to account for the peculiar condition of things connected with this bill for the relief of the College of William and Mary.

I remember that when this bill was presented some years ago, a printed report accompanying the bill from the Committee on Education and Labor charged that the building of William and Mary college was burned by drunken and disorderly soldiers of the United States. I find as from year to year this bill has been presented, reported upon, discussed, and defeated or passed over, the language of the reports has become modified. In the present report there is no charge that drunken and disorderly soldiers of the United States burned William and Mary college. That was too bold, too aggressive, too aggravating a charge even for the House of Representatives of the United States; and it has been withdrawn.

I will not go through the long history of the action of Congress and its committees upon this bill, the discussions which have taken place, the gradual drawing in of the demand from one founded in absolute justice and equity for a wrong done by drunken and disorderly soldiers, till at the present time it comes to be an appeal to this House, as so eloquently presented by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING,] who has made the only fair presentation of this case; it comes to be an appeal to this House because this college was an institution of learning, because of its antiquity, because of the many splendid names of those who have been connected with it, because we should all protect and sacredly preserve institutions of learning as far as may be from the ravages of war. On these grounds the representatives of the people are asked to vote away the people's money as a gratuity to William and Mary college for losses and damages for which the nation is not responsible, for which no nation in any country has ever held itself responsible. Thus by the admission of the advocates of the bill it has come to be a simple proposition to pay to William and Mary college thousands of dollars of money as a simple gratuity for injuries, for damage, for loss, occasioned by somebody, under some circumstances, but for which the people of the United States and the Government of the United States are in no way legally, morally, or equitably responsible.

Sir, I have opposed the passage of this and similar bills for many long years here because I have considered it the entering-wedge to the presentation and the successful prosecution of hundreds and perhaps thousands of this class of claims, involving the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars. I say that no man can conscientiously in the discharge of his duty vote for this bill unless he can vote with equal conscientiousness to pay a large portion of the damage and losses incurred by institutions and by individuals during the late war.

I say more than that, sir, and I do not say it as a threat, that no northern man, be he republican or be he democrat, dare vote for this bill and expect to receive the approval of that constituency which will have to bear the burden of this and other appropriations for similar purposes. If there be one thing at the North which the people understand better than another in regard to their liabilities to taxation and to burdens in the future it is that this William and Mary college bill is the foundation, the entering-wedge, the great precedent over all other cases which will be followed by troops and troops of bills marshaled in solid array here calling for the expenditure of the treasure of the United States which all the diligence, and all the industry, and all the economy, and all the activity of the American people cannot pay if they would, and which their judgment will not permit them to pay if they could.

Now, sir, after all the elaborate arguments, after all the displays of flowery eloquence, after all the array of the heroes of Virginia who have graduated at this college, after all the splendid panorama of its antiquities, it comes to this: that Virginia holds up this old moss-grown institution to the American people and asks for a gratuity to restore it to what it ought to be and what they claim it was when our troops took possession of it, and what they desire it shall be. On that bloody day, after the fierce encounters before that city, after thousands and thousands of men on both sides had fallen dead and wounded, our troops entered Williamsburgh. These gentlemen, my friend from Massachusetts, these gentlemen would have you believe that on that day this university sacred to education was the abode of peace, the home of men pursuing their studies under the light of the midnight lamp, and that on the morning after they heard the resounding cannon and lifted their worn and weary heads from the toil and study of the old books that were gathered in this sacred institution of learning, that they threw off their cowls and their caps, that they laid aside their robes and looked out of their windows and down into the court of this college, awakening from that philosophical dream of years, and inquired, "What means all this confusion; [laughter;] what causes this disturbance within the sacred precincts of learning?" as if they had never heard of war; as if for years they had not been teaching war and rebellion from the dome to the foundation of that old university; as if for months it had not been a deserted building, because its president and its professors and its students, ay, down to those of fifteen years of age, had donned the armor of the southern republic and gone to do the battles of the South!

What was the condition of this college when our troops marched into Williamsburgh and occupied that city? What was the repose, the peacefulness of this venerable institution? Its president was even then flushed with the excitement of the preceding conflict; its professors, some of them, wounded and laid low; some of them inmates of the same building then used as a hospital.

What else was this building used for on that day? It was a prison-house. Yes, Mr. Chairman, William and Mary college on the 8th day of May, 1862, when General McClellan rode with his staff of officers into Williamsburgh and repaired directly to the college building, at that moment it was the prison-house of Union officers and Union soldiers confined there—wounded, bleeding, dying, prisoners of the Union Army gathered into that college, this sacred institution of learning; gathered there to be kept, gathered there to die.

More than that, it was then a hospital and had been for a long time previous. It was filled with the wounded, with the dying, with the dead from those armies. What was its condition? Outside, the fences had been broken down, the grass-plats destroyed, even the beautiful monument which had been placed in the front of that building had been destroyed by southern troops who had occupied it as a prison, as a hospital, as a garrison. The walls of the building were defaced, outside and in; the fences, the stone columns were broken; the trees were cut down; the monument of a distinguished Virginian was defaced when our troops first came in sight of and up to this building.

The pictures which fancy has drawn of this peaceful, secluded university of learning, this delightful home of the muses, where the sacred nine tripped along the grass, the admiration of the professors and of the young student, are overdrawn.

I appeal from the fancy sketches of these eloquent gentlemen from Massachusetts and from Virginia, these delightful recollections of the home and the abode of the sacred nine, to the historic record of that day. I am somewhat deficient in powers of description; I lack those essential elements which some of my friends have for picturing out gracefully and forcibly the condition of that institution. So I will send to the desk and let the Clerk read a plain, sober statement by an eye-witness of the condition of that institution at the very moment when Union soldiers came there to drive out confederate soldiers who, with a recklessness unexpected among civilized men, with a barbarity scarcely to be found among savages, had thrust themselves into the precincts of this sacred university, had destroyed its monuments, cut down its shade trees, defaced its walls, broken down its stone columns, occupied its inclosures for prison-pens of captured enemies, and as hospitals for the confederate troops; and that, too, not with the cleanliness, not with the regard even to the common decencies of hospital treatment which we should expect to find. That is the picture which I shall present of that institution at the very moment when it passed from the power of the confederate soldier to the power of the Union soldier. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked; and I ask the attention of gentlemen. I hope my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LORING] is not going away.

Mr. LORING. I am putting on my coat, as it is cold here.

Mr. CONGER. I hope to warm up the subject before I am through with it. What I ask the Clerk to read is dated May 8, 1862.

The Clerk read as follows:

General McClellan and staff drove directly through the city to the college building, from the roof of which the Stars and Stripes caught the breeze and our signal corps had already established a station communicating with the several divisions of the Army. Entering the edifice, which is of brick and somewhat imposing, though less so than the structure burned some years since, a visit was made to the several rooms, in all of which were more or less of the rebel wounded, abandoned by their fleeing brethren.

* * * * * * *

I went into several of the buildings—all the churches are hospitals—but only to find them as slovenly as the college.

* * * * * * *

In an upper room of the college our wounded of the Excelsior Brigade were found. The enemy had not time to carry them off, and very fortunately, for the journey to Richmond must have proved painful, if not fatal to many. Colonel Dwight, of the First Regiment, was stretched upon a cot in the center of the room. His wound in the leg had been partially dressed, but he was by no means comfortable.

The appearance of the college hospital was not at all creditable to its rebel keepers. The floors, the stairs, the walls, and even the windows were covered with filth, and we had only to open the pantries or stroll in the yard to detect as many distinct or well-defined stenches as Coleridge counted in the dirty streets of Cologne. Medical stores and implements, fragments of furniture and clothing, broken crockery, cooking utensils, and kindred rubbish were strewn all over the building, while the grounds heretofore so picturesque and well protected, which for their historic associations, if for nothing more, should have been jealously guarded, were a complete waste. The fences prostrate, the stone gate-posts overturned, the sod and trees destroyed, and even the marble statue of Baron de Botetourt disfigured and begrimed with mud.

The houses lately occupied by the professors, and situated on either side of the college building, had been used by rebel officers, and, profiting by their example, General Jameson, now made military governor of the place, had made one of them his headquarters.

Mr. GOODE. Will the gentleman from Michigan allow me to inquire who is the author of the communication just read?

Mr. CONGER. I will tell the gentleman in a moment. That is a part of a long communication from the correspondent of the New York Evening Post——

Mr. GOODE. What is his name?

Mr. CONGER. Written May 8, 1862.

Mr. GOODE. The name of the writer, if you please.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot tell you.

Mr. GOODE. It is the communication of an anonymous scribbler, then.

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; it is the letter of a man sent with the armies and permitted to go with the armies of the United States to report to the people of the United States the events and circumstances and condition of the Army of the country, of the captured places, and of the places not captured; a man accompanying General McClellan and his staff as such correspondent. He says: "I rode with General McClellan as he entered the city and visited with him all these places." Now, sir, that is a communication—I have had but part of it read—printed long ago, just after the time of the occurrences before the burning of this building, in the New York Evening Post, from its correspondent, giving a vivid description. Does the gentleman deny it?

Mr. GOODE. I do not deny that such a description was written. But I demand to know if this House is to be called upon to believe it, and to attach faith to the writing of an anonymous correspondent?

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman cannot in his place, coming from that region, deny it, I take it for granted this House will not long hesitate to believe a communication published, within three days of the time when it was written, in the New York Evening Post.

Mr. GOODE. I do deny the truth of the statement, but I cannot deny that such a letter was written. The gentleman has misunderstood me.

Mr. CONGER. I thought the gentleman must deny the statement. I have not time to go through the RECORD and report to this House his speeches in which he has dwelt upon the peaceful beauty, the slumbering quietude of those venerable halls, until the ruthless hand of a drunken Union soldier set fire to the contents and destroyed the building.

Mr. Chairman, this whole scheme of dragging money from the Treasury has been surrounded and gilded with sentiment, with pictures, with adornments drawn not from the real, solid, loathsome facts of the case, but from the fancy of gentlemen who have talked upon the subject.

Oh, sir, Congress is to be wheedled out of this money by the siren songs of the sweet minstrel of Virginia, and the dulcet alto from Massachusetts! [Laughter.]

While I listened to this eloquent address I, too, felt that if I could restore that venerable institution to its pristine glory and excellence, if it was not for me to inquire what my constituents might think about it. With my feelings all wrought up to a love for the beautiful and intellectual, I was almost led to feel that I could vote away the dollars of the people, the American dollar with the American eagle on it and the motto "In God we trust," and all that, to replace that venerable institution. [Laughter.]

I thank my friend from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] that he did not force a vote upon this bill when I was carried away by these overpowering emotions. I have had time for my thoughts to cool. I have had time to subdue some of the earnestness of my imagination. I have had time since then to read again from the Rebellion Record the account of the situation of that building on the day when our troops took possession of it.

It was then a prison-house for our Union soldiers, wounded and dying, and also a hospital kept in the most slovenly manner, with its walls begrimed with dirt; with its doors broken down; with the grass even in its yard trampled and torn up, and with the statue of Baron Botetourt, the pride of Virginians, overturned and injured in the very presence of such an institution; with its venerable trees cut down to boil the pot of the confederate soldiers. [Laughter.]

I have recalled, so far as I have been able, my wandering fancies. I have subdued with gigantic effort my tendency to vote for this bill. I have been saved and I have been redeemed from committing a grave fault, and I owe it more perhaps than anything else to the fact that my friend from Virginia, whatever his motive might have been, postponed calling the previous question on a former occasion and gave me time to recall those wandering fancies.

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman seems disposed to revive historical associations; will he state where General Botetourt lived, for he speaks of him as a favorite of Virginia?

Mr. CONGER. I said he was a favorite of Virginians. Was he not?

Mr. GOODE. He was not a Virginian.

Mr. CONGER. Must the gentleman to carry his bill throw discredit upon all that Virginians have ever honored. For one I will not permit it; at least I will not permit that he shall do it in my time. I decline to permit him to destroy what respect we have for Virginians, when we know that they gave their reverence, love, and affection to Baron Botetourt, and those are degenerate sons of Virginia who come to this House of Representatives to throw discredit upon the taste and affection of their ancestors.

Sir, let the gentleman in reply repudiate the affections of his people for this venerable man, but it shall not come out of my time. [Laughter.]

I ask the Clerk to send me back the Rebellion Record, and while I am waiting for it the gentleman may be considering how soon he will write to his friends at Richmond to ask them to introduce a bill into the Legislature to take away the name of Botetourt from one of their counties and give it the name of some other man that he respects more.

Virginians may not have admired Baron Botetourt, but they placed his statue before their university and they gave his name to one of their counties.

Now, sir, what was the condition of this university at the time the Union troops took possession of it? It was in a dilapidated, disgraced, and dishonored condition. Dishonored by the confederate troops; an institution of learning around which clusters so much veneration!

I think my friend from Virginia was there, and now he comes here and tells us that it was dismantled and laid waste by Union soldiers. If that were not enough, it is charged in the printed report that the drunken and disorderly soldiers of a Pennsylvania cavalry regiment destroyed the building.

If that charge had been made in regard to a Michigan regiment there would have been somebody from that State to repel it. [Laughter.] I look in vain to either side of this House for a Pennsylvanian to repel that heinous charge.

Such, then, was the condition of this university when it came into the hands of Union men. It was cleansed; it was purified; the confederates were driven from it; the wounded soldiers were removed to a better hospital as soon as possible. It is true it was occupied, peacefully occupied, by Union troops from that time until the next September. It was cleanly in its occupation; no damage was done to it. There is not a particle of proof anywhere that after our troops took possession of that building there was the least damage done to it. On the other hand its condition was vastly improved until about the 8th or 9th of the September following; I will not be exact about the date. Then the confederates, under Colonel Shingles, seeing how we preserved that college, attacked Williamsburgh, and by surprise captured Colonel Campbell and several of his officers. What they did, why they did it, is unexplained by these gentlemen.

On the lower floors of the building there was a large amount of medical stores for the wounded and the sick of both armies and all armies, deposited there for use. Whether it was burned in that attack, whether the fire was set there by rebel soldiers, whether it was burned by Union soldiers, or whether it caught fire accidentally, I have examined with great care to find some proof and have been able to find none.

When Colonel Shingles was killed and several of his officers taken prisoners, and his troops driven from the city of Williamsburgh, in the very midst of the conflict, about long enough for a fire which had been kindled in that building by confederate troops while they were in its occupancy to make itself visible, a fire broke out, and there was no time in the midst of deadly conflict to maintain our possession in that city, to extinguish the fire. A surprise far within our lines had taken place; the college had been seized by the confederates; a fight was going on. In some way the combustibles within that building, whatever they may have been, took fire. In the very heat of the conflict, while our troops were driving the enemy outside of the city, the building was burned. That is the history of it; brief, short, correct.

Now, sir, I have given what no man here can controvert, in few words, the exact condition of that building before the occupancy of our troops and the exact condition of that building when the surprise by Colonel Shingles of the confederate army occurred, the only known manner in which the building was burned and all the damage that was done to it.

I assert here now, without fear of contradiction, that all the damage to the grounds and to the building, except the final burning, which ever did occur, occurred while that building was in the possession of the confederate forces. No man can deny it; no man can bring one particle of proof to the contrary, or else he has been more successful than I have been after a long examination of all the means of information within my power.

I have been to the War Department; I have had the rebel archives themselves searched to find some proof in regard to this building and its burning, something further than has been published, and I have failed to find anything further.

This matter in all its varied forms has been creeping along, undermining the consciences and patriotism of members of this House for many years. These are the pure, naked facts in this case. It does not present to my mind a case with any more reason or ground for the aid of the people of the United States to restore this university as it was before the confederates destroyed it than a hundred other cases which I have examined. I now ask the Clerk to read from the Rebellion Record, under date of September 9, a description of the hospital at that time. It is not claimed by anybody that there was any damage to the grounds or to the buildings, making them at least worse than they were before.

Mr. GOODE. From what does the gentleman read now?

Mr. CONGER. From the Rebellion Record, a document which has great credence among the people of the United States.

Mr. GOODE. What particular part of it? Who is the author of what is about to be read?

Mr. CONGER. Well, this afternoon, after the House has adjourned, I will talk it over with the gentleman.

Mr. GOODE. That is in entire keeping with the gentleman's course.

The Clerk read as follows:

Colonel Shingles, with a force of rebel cavalry and three pieces of artillery, made an attack on Williamsburgh, Virginia, this morning. After having captured the national pickets, they marched into town, taking the troops by surprise. An engagement ensued, which lasted about thirty minutes. The national forces consisted of the Fifth Pennsylvania Cavalry, Colonel Campbell, who was taken prisoner, together with five captains, four lieutenants, and a few privates. The rebel commander, Colonel Shingles, and eight of his officers and men were killed.

Mr. CONGER. That is the history and the only history I have been able to find, except such as is contained in the report of the board of inquiry in regard to the conduct of Colonel Campbell when he was on trial for being surprised by the enemy. There is no allusion in any of those papers to the origin of this fire or the circumstances attending it. Even the burning of the building is not mentioned.

It will be remembered that a few years before this the university had been burned to the ground; it had been repaired; it had been rebuilt, but with less expense and tastefulness than had been bestowed upon the former building. It was not the old College of William and Mary which was destroyed by the fire; that venerable institution had already been burned to the ground, and existed only as it had arisen from its ashes. It was the phœnix which was burned on the occasion now in question. It is the phœnix—a bird of fable now, as it always was—that we are called upon to pay for. Shall we pay for the phœnix? Shall we give our gratuity for the fable? That is the practical question which appeals to members of this House, stripped of all the flowers of fancy, stripped of all the rhetoric and all the eloquence, which is suited equally well to any college commencement, equally well to any literary essay before any literary club; far better suited to touch the heart and the fancy of young students and imaginative maidens than to control the action, the serious, calm action of members of the House of Representatives when by their votes they are about to establish a precedent by which and through which the people of the United States may be taxed millions upon millions of dollars.

Sir, I have opposed this measure from the commencement of its progress in this House, seven or eight years ago, year by year until the present time. I have endeavored to speak truthfully and plainly of the injury to that institution. I have shown that it came from confederate troops. The injury came from Virginia troops; from their own people. It was the home of treason; it was the nursery-place of rebellion. The confederates changed it into a prison for Union soldiers—a hospital for confederate and Union wounded and dying men. They disfigured the ground; they broke down the walls; they destroyed the monuments; they filled those sacred halls with filth and uncleanliness. That is the picture I have drawn.

My duty as regards this bill is so plain and so transparent that if I desired ever so much to pay reverence to the ancient seats of learning I could not do it in this case. There are many far more meritorious cases of institutions of learning, beneficial and charitable institutions, even sanctuaries of worship, that would appeal with far more force to me to restore them to their pristine condition than does this home of treason.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said all I desire. I propose to give to other gentlemen the remainder of my time if they wish to occupy it.

Mr. LORING rose.

Mr. CONGER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING.]

Mr. LORING. Mr. Chairman, I have just returned to this House, in which I have sat but two days during this session, having been prevented from doing my duty here by circumstances to which I can only refer as a sufficient reason for my absence; and for the same reason I am in no condition physically and mentally to reply to the eloquent and fair and manly and high-toned and classical speech made by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

I wish I had some small portion of the strength which I had when I had the honor to address the House on a former occasion upon this question—a question which I met and argued here, not with a disposition to surrender my views, as a republican, of the general policy of this Government, but with a desire to let my people and this country know that we hoped the time had come when, looking beyond all the local trials, all the difficulties of the great conflict that had surrounded and oppressed us, we could seize the bright and luminous spots of the conflict and turn our attention to peace and an adjustment of our difficulties.

I presented this question in a way which I find is not satisfactory to older and more experienced legislators than I am. I did come here believing in the educational institutions of this country, in the old moss-grown colleges, as the gentleman from Michigan calls them, in those institutions which have sent scholars into our land to guide the councils of the nation in early and later trials. I did come here filled with veneration for them, and I am happy to say, sir, that my veneration has been increased, not diminished, by the attacks that have been made upon them. I love the old universities still; and I am determined to love them, however much they may be assailed by gentlemen who desire to hold them and their students up to the ridicule of this House and the country. Sir, this question as presented to my mind—it may be a young, inexperienced, thoughtless, perhaps sentimental member of this House—was an old question of my own party here. I cannot be precise because I have not the data before me; but the memorial brought to this House, I think in the Forty-second Congress, was presented by my distinguished predecessor in this body.

Mr. GOODE. The Forty-first Congress.

Mr. LORING. I believe it was the Forty-first. I do not undertake to be accurate about the dates. The distinguished gentleman who preceded me here presented this memorial and first brought this question before this House and the country. He has not been remarkable for surrendering either to his own party or to any other party; he has not been noted for surrendering to those whom he antagonized during the war. Yet he found it in his heart to bring in here a memorial asking for the restoration of one of the great educational landmarks of the country. That gentlemen may have no doubt to whom I refer, I desire to say that I am representing the district once represented here by General BUTLER, and that it was he who, actuated I doubt not by high and patriotic motives, presented the memorial to which I allude.

[Here the hammer fell. Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. CONGER. I yield a few minutes more to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. There are but three minutes more of the gentleman's time remaining.

Mr. LORING. The memorial was presented here; as I have said. It was not acted on in that Congress, if I remember rightly. In the Forty-third Congress it was advocated by one of the most distinguished scholars and statesmen of Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] and toward the close of the session, I believe the second session of that Congress, it passed this House, then a strong and solid republican body, by a vote of about 117 to 70, and among those 117 I find enrolled the name of every Massachusetts member then on this floor except two. I find among those voting in the affirmative such men as BANKS, (not distinguished for disloyalty,) such men as TWITCHELL, such men as BUTLER, such men as HOAR, Esty, and Crocker, all taught in republican schools, and earnest in their support of republican doctrines. There were but two gentlemen from Massachusetts who either neglected to vote for the bill or voted against it, if I remember rightly.

That bill was lost in a republican Senate because that body had no time to reach it during that session. The gentleman from Massachusetts, who in that day saw fit by report and speech to advocate the measure, won laurels then which helped to lift him from this House into a seat in the other branch which he so ably and honorably fills.

I was young and inexperienced, a dreamer perhaps, untaught in the wily and wiry ways of Congress. [Laughter.] I had been in the Massachusetts Legislature and brought with me the experience and lessons I had learned in that admirable school, [laughter,] but——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired and the time to which the House limited general debate has also been exhausted.

Mr. CONGER. I reserved one minute for myself and it is the Chair's fault if I have lost it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct, there was an interruption and he will be recognized for the time of that interruption.

Mr. CONGER. I only rise to say, Mr. Chairman, that I made a little, gentle, personal allusion to my friend from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. LORING rose.

Mr. CONGER. Not a moment; I have given you all the time I could. My allusion to him was mild and gentle, and I thought just enough to give the gentleman from Massachusetts an opportunity to apologize to the House and to the country for his former speech in behalf of this bill. [Laughter.] Sir, I did not attribute that speech to youth; I did not attribute it to verdancy; I did not attribute it to lack of experience which might have been acquired in the Massachusetts Legislature, for God knows if there is any body in this world which need never go to any other legislative body to learn anything it is the Massachusetts Legislature, [laughter;] but it was that my friend might come here and might say again to the world, say to the country, say to this House that he brought his views from the closet and not from the law library; that he came here imbued with the robes of scholarship and asked, as he did ask this House, to make a gratuity to this institution simply because it was a college and because, as he said here to-day, he was a lover of colleges.

I have accomplished my purpose in the gentle, peaceful, rather graceful reminder which I gave to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and he has had his opportunity. Indeed we have both done very well on this question, and I now yield the floor. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time to which the general debate was limited by the House has now expired.

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Chairman, as the member reporting this bill to the House from the committee, I claim one hour under the rules to close debate, and I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts as much of that time as he may desire.

Mr. CONGER. That cannot be.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The time for debate was limited.

Mr. CONGER. The House has directed the committee what to do, and the time is now exhausted.

Mr. GOODE. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will not insist upon his objection; but if he does I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the rule on page 116 of the Digest:

> No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate in the House or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close the debate.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has already opened the debate, and under the decision in the House he cannot close it. My point is that if entitled to the hour it is after the previous question has been ordered in the House.

Mr. GOODE. The previous question has not been called and cannot be called in committee.

Mr. CONGER. Under the decision of the Speaker the gentleman cannot both open and close the debate.

Mr. PHILLIPS. It was the agreement of the House that all general debate should close on this bill in one hour, and that precludes any right which the gentleman from Virginia may have had.

Mr. GOODE. I ask the Chair to rule on the point. I claim the privilege of one hour to close the debate under the rules.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. All debate in committee has been closed by agreement.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the rule is this: when a bill is committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for consideration and the debate has been limited to a specific time, when that time has expired the bill is then before the committee for discussion under the five-minute rule, and after discussion under the five-minute rule it must be reported to the House, when the member reporting a bill from a committee may close the debate.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. We are not in the House; we are in the Committee of the Whole, and the time for the debate has been fixed, and that time has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I said we were not in the House.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, whether the committee cannot rise and go into the House and there extend the time for debate, notwithstanding the agreement?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question which does not now arise, and perhaps is not proper for the Chair to answer. The Speaker decides points of order in the House, the Chairman in committee. The gentleman from Virginia claims the floor, and if entitled to the floor no other member could make the motion that the committee rise without his consent. He demands the ruling of the Chair on the question, and the Chair must rule on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know whether the Chair understood my point of order. The House, by unanimous consent, or what was equivalent to unanimous consent, limited debate in the committee. Now I understand, and I suppose it is the understanding of all, that when we rise and go into the House after the previous question has been ordered, then there would be an hour for the gentleman who reported the bill. I submit the point of order that he is not entitled to the hour now.

The CHAIRMAN. The point raised by the gentleman from Michigan is that the House having ordered that all general debate close in two hours, and the two hours having expired, the gentleman from Virginia who reported this measure is not entitled under Rule 60 to an hour in Committee of the Whole to close debate.

Mr. CONGER. Having used his hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, having already occupied one hour, as the Chair understands, in opening the debate. In regard to the latter objection, that the gentleman from Virginia has already taken an hour in opening the debate, the Chair desires to refer to a decision of the House in the Thirty-first Congress, first session, where the point of order was made that the member reporting a measure having made an opening speech, followed by a running debate participated in by other members occupying the floor in their own right, and the previous question having been ordered, the gentleman reporting the measure had not an hour to close the debate in reply. The Speaker ruled that he was entitled to the additional hour to close the debate, and the House, upon an appeal, by a yea and nay vote, sustained that decision. The Clerk will read, for the information of the committee, the Journal of the proceedings when that decision was made.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Mr. Burt moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; when
> Mr. Strong rose, and was proceeding to close the debate.
> Mr. Alexander Evans made the point of order that the previous question having been seconded, and the main question ordered to be put, it was not in order for Mr. Strong to proceed.
> The Speaker decided that the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Strong,] having reported the measure under consideration from a committee, was entitled, under the thirty-fourth rule of the House, to open and close the debate thereon, and that he did not think he was deprived of that right by the previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered to be put. That rule was adopted during the last Congress, and at the same session the question arose in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union as to the right of the member to make his closing speech after the expiration of the hour at which the debate had been ordered to be closed. It was then held by the committee that he had the right, and by a parity of reasoning (the rule applying as well to the House as the committee) it would seem to be his privilege in the present case, especially as there had been no debate on the subject in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; otherwise the member reporting the measure would be deprived of the benefit of the rule.
> From this decision Mr. Alexander Evans appealed.
> And the question being put, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?
> It was decided in the affirmative.
> So the decision of the Chair was sustained, and Mr. Strong proceeded to close the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. In the case just read it was decided by the Speaker and by the House on appeal, as a reference to the Congressional Globe will show, that, first, a member reporting a measure from a committee, having taken his hour to open the debate thereon, is entitled to an additional hour to reply and close debate if another member has occupied the floor in his own right in opposition to the measure. Second, that he may take this additional hour to close debate after the main question has been ordered.

Under that decision, if this debate had taken place in the House, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] although he has taken an hour in opening the debate, since the debate has been continued by members occupying the floor in their own right, would seem to be entitled to an hour to close debate after the main question had been ordered. Is he entitled to an hour to close debate in Committee of the Whole after the time has expired to which general debate was limited by order of the House?

The Speaker based his ruling as to the right of an additional hour to close debate in the House after the main question had been ordered upon the construction that had been given to Rule 60 when a measure was under consideration in Committee of the Whole at a previous Congress.

The right of the reporter of a measure to his closing hour in the House after the main question had been ordered was sustained because under previous decisions he had such right in committee after debate had been closed by order of the House.

The rules of procedure during debate in the House and general debate in the Committee of the Whole are similar, as will be seen from Rule 113.

The Clerk will now read Rule 113, relating to proceedings in committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The rules of proceedings in the House shall be observed in a Committee of the Whole House, so far as they may be applicable, except the rule limiting the times of speaking; but no member shall speak twice to any question until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds that Rule 60, which he is called upon to interpret in its application to proceedings in Committee of the Whole at this time, was adopted in the Thirtieth Congress, on the 18th of December, 1847, being reported by a select committee to revise the rules. Within three weeks a question arose in Committee of the Whole as to the construction to be given to Rule 60, at which time the identical question arose which is now presented and is referred to in the decision just read by the Clerk. A bill reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was referred to the Committee of the Whole and all general debate ordered to be closed thereon in two hours and a half. Upon the expiration of the time to which general debate had been limited, Mr. Goggin, of Virginia, who reported the bill, claimed his right under the rule to an hour to close the debate. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole, Mr. Caleb B. Smith, who had been a member of the select committee that reported the rule, decided that the member reporting the measure from a committee was entitled to an hour to close the debate after the time had expired to which general debate had been limited by the House. From this decision an appeal was taken. Nearly all of the members of the committee that reported the rule participated in the debate. They stated that the Chair had decided in accordance with the express and unanimous understanding of the committee as to the meaning and effect of the rule. To the objections that the committee would prolong the debate for an hour beyond the time fixed by the House, the members of the Committee on Rules answered that it was their intention to give the reporter of a measure an hour to close debate after the expiration of the time limited for general debate in the committee. The discussion explains the rule as having been framed and intended to secure to a committee not only an opportunity at the opening of the debate to explain through one of its members the provisions of a measure perfected and recommended by the committee, but at the close a further opportunity to answer objections made during the discussion by the opponents of the measure.

The decision of the Chair on the appeal was sustained by a vote of 103 to 70.

This contemporaneous interpretation and application of Rule 60 by the very Congress that first adopted it, and the explanation of its meaning given by the Committee on Rules that framed it seems to the Chair to be decisive of the question and the point of order.

It was first decided that in Committee of the Whole, where the House has by order closed debate in Committee of the Whole, a member reporting a measure from a committee, if a running debate occurs thereon, although he has taken an hour in opening, has a right to close the debate in committee by a reply after the time has expired to which general debate was limited. The Chair therefore, in accordance with these precedents, rules that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] is now entitled to one hour to close the debate in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say a word on just one point. I stated before there was no question in my mind that the gentleman from Virginia would have the right to his hour after the previous question was ordered. I suppose he would have that right even if he were permitted an hour now. In the conversation on the subject it was talked of as an hour being given after the previous question was ordered, and it was to prevent the repetition of the hour, so as to make it two hours, that I raised the point. I have no desire to limit the debate, but I do not think that two hours should be given for reply instead of one.

Mr. GOODE. I do not hear the gentleman from Michigan, but I insist that the ruling of the Chair should be carried out unless the gentleman takes an appeal.

Mr. CONGER. Nor do I hear the gentleman from Virginia. We are both thick about the head. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOODE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING.]

Mr. LORING. When my time expired I was reciting the history of this question now before the committee and stating the attractions which it presented to my mind as a republican student desirous of comprehending and supporting the best principles of our Government and of recognizing the genius of our institutions. The attractions, as I was stating, that first presented themselves were, that the measure was born on this side of the House and passed this House when it was under the control of those gentlemen with whom I sympathize. It was introduced by gentlemen whose views then accorded with my own, and do now, advocated by them, sent before the country by them. A distinguished gentleman now on this floor from Ohio, distinguished gentlemen now gone, from Rhode Island and from Pennsylvania, have recorded their votes in favor of the measure which I in my inexperience, looking over the records of those believed on the floor to be sounder republicans than I was, thought as a republican I might safely support. When I was asked, therefore, as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor to support this measure in the House, I did it with the prestige attached to it, to which I have referred, with the conviction that it was a republican measure of generosity and peace, and I had and now have a right so to consider it.

I made my argument upon that line; and if the gentleman will be fair and remember that I declared over and over again that this college had advocated the sentiments of that section of the country where it existed, and that it had presented another instance in which professors and students had gone forth to battle, and followed an example which had been set before by illustrious and ardent men everywhere, whether right or wrong, successful or unsuccessful, he will do me the justice to which I am entitled. I looked upon this question as one elevated entirely above the controversies which naturally divide ardent men engaged in discussing the political questions of the country. I stated at the time that I did not care to bring up the personal history of the question, but I had no desire to rehearse the circumstances which surrounded the injury done to the college. I agreed at once with the recital of those circumstances, but I endeavored to elevate this matter entirely above the mere question of war claims of every sort and description, and to present it here as an instance in our history in which a measure has been adopted by the dominant party controlling public affairs, for the purpose of restoring peace and harmony in the minds of the American people.

I held that the colleges, the churches, the school-houses of the South should have been restored as one of the first and most necessary measures of reconstruction; and I asked gentlemen upon both sides of the House if such a measure would not have presented to the civilized world a high and honorable example of which we should all be proud and which would have done more to pacify the American mind and warm the American heart on both sides of the line than any act that could have been accomplished by those then in power. Sir, I believed it then, and I believe it now, even when the time for such concessions seems to be past. At the close of the war I asked a restoration of the educational institutions of the South by Congress; I asked that this restoration should form a part of reconstruction. Not being a member of the House at that time, I had no opportunity to present my views upon that question except through the mouth of one of the distinguished Representatives of my State upon this floor.

The suggestion was not adopted; the plan failed; but still, sir, I find the sentiment manifested everywhere, and I know that conflicting men can unite and warm and rouse their better natures to action before the institutions of learning and religion and before historical associations such as are connected with this question.

Those were the circumstances and influences under which I advocated this measure at the last session. That was the way in which the question presented itself to my mind before older and more distinguished members of the House taught me many ways of wisdom and, I trust, enlightened me on many of those processes by which an untaught representative may escape the dangers of the political path which he endeavors to tread.

Now, sir, having taken this stand, you cannot imagine my astonishment when I found myself charged with advocating disloyal war claims and introducing an entering-wedge for a recognition of such demands to a ruinous extent upon our Government. Why, sir, I declare unequivocally that at that time I was opposed to allowing such claims; and I am happy to say that the idea which I then presented has been taken up by a distinguished statesman from Vermont in the other House, who has introduced a measure for a constitutional limitation upon the payment of all such claims, in the support of which I doubt not every man in the country who has the welfare of the country at heart would gladly join. This was my own proposition, presented here after consultation with many of the wisest and soundest men of my own party—my own suggestion; and I am glad to see that one of the ablest, most influential statesmen of the time has taken up that proposition and is endeavoring to incorporate it into the constitutional law of the land.

Many warm-hearted republicans here and in my own section have called me to account for my action upon this question; and if I had not been sustained by those whose intelligence was superior to mine, and whose existence was dearer to me than life itself, if I had not received the approval of hosts of soldiers and civilians, and of thoughtful men North and South, I might have doubted the wisdom of my action, I might have suspected myself of having committed an unpardonable political sin thus early in my congressional career. I thank those who stood by me, in many walks in life and from every section of the land; I thank also those who raised the question against me, inasmuch as it gave my friends an opportunity to express themselves as they did, and my party an opportunity to support me generously notwithstanding our differences of opinion on this matter.

Sir, I advocate no war claims. I simply ask that this question may be put upon the high plane of American statesmanship and settled upon the high plane of American generosity and justice, so that it might stand in history for all time as an example which those who are to come after us might follow; an example set us by every civilized nation on the face of the earth which has been swept by civil war or invaded by foreign foes. On this ground alone would I support it.

Now, sir, I am charged with insulting Union soldiers, with stating that a drunken Union-soldier mob burned this building. I said no such thing.

Mr. CONGER. Neither did I say that the gentleman said it. I said that a former printed report, made by the predecessor of the gentleman, [Mr. HOAR,] did charge that a drunken, disorderly soldiery burned this building.

Mr. LORING. If the gentleman from Michigan says he did not charge me with such a statement, I have nothing to say one way or the other. The gentleman whom he charges with having made it can defend himself better than I can against any charge made against himself here or elsewhere.

Now, sir, there has been a great deal said in this House, since this question came up, in regard to the relations which have existed between Massachusetts and Virginia. The Representatives of Massachusetts are not responsible for that. No Representative from Massachusetts on this floor proposes to gush over that for the gratification of any calm and cool and disinterested observer sitting here from any neighboring State, or for the purpose of giving any gentleman an opportunity to furnish again a classical allusion to the heated and torturing poker for the benefit and amusement of this House.

But I do wish to say that the historical bonds that bind the States of Massachusetts and Virginia can never be broken. The streams of blood which ran from Massachusetts into Virginia veins can never be destroyed. Those of us whose ancestors gave away the lands of Virginia to their best-beloved children, because they considered that State as the favored spot of this nation, when Massachusetts was struggling for existence, will never forget those acts; they never can be forgotten. The relations which exist between these two old Commonwealths are such that there is a natural impulse which cannot be resisted, and which calls upon each to stand by the other whenever their relations in the past are assailed.

Massachusetts and Virginia have an honorable record, won by their united action in our early national conflicts. They have also been interlocked exactly as the great Northwestern States have been bound to Massachusetts—by names and families, by blood, and by every tie that make the younger States of this nation dear to the older ones. Now let no debate which may take place in this House on a question in which either side is interested assume such a character as to make it in any way appear that it is trifling, dishonorable, trivial, and puerile for a son of Massachusetts to defend the old universities of Virginia, or for a son of Virginia to defend the old universities of Massachusetts.

I have looked at this question from the stand-point that I have described here as a republican. I have explained here the exact attitude in which it is presented to my mind. I have stated here what the feelings of my own State are in regard to Virginia herself. I have stated distinctly what my own views are and what have been the views of my colleagues and predecessors in this House for many years past on the question now before us.

Again, sir, my imagination has been called in question here. It is true it may differ from the imagination of other gentlemen on this floor. There may be two pictures to be drawn here. If this college was the filthy and putrid scene presented by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] if the picture which he has given us here, and which is for the first time presented to this House, with regard to the condition of this university, is in any measure true, and he has been allowed to exercise his imagination in giving one side of this picture, will he not be charitable enough to allow us on the other side to exert our imagination also so as to give a favorable view of it, if such a view is possible? I am sure that his candor, his fairness, his sense of justice, his liberality, and his patriotism will at least allow his associates on this floor to exercise in a small degree those intellectual powers which he himself has exercised so largely.

I have listened with great pleasure to the picture he has drawn; it is a curious picture, a striking picture. The lines he drew were vivid, and the condition of affairs there was, to me, unexpected. When I made the argument for the benefit of this college, I had no idea that I was speaking for a roof which covered both sides of the question in the great conflict. I had no idea that this university had been converted into a common hospital for both parties in the bitter and bloody strife. I had no idea that it had been accepted as a temple which would shelter friend and foe alike.

But I learn now from the gentleman from Michigan that instead of simply being an institution of learning, it was an institution which had been converted into one of large, broad, and liberal charities, covering loyal and disloyal with a common shelter. Notwithstanding the depressing picture which has been presented, I am more kindly inclined than ever to the old college itself for its classical honors in peace and for its charitable services in war. I am under obligation to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] for so liberally giving me the opportunity to be not only just but generous to an institution which, according to his view, is manifestly entitled to justice and generosity alike.

I trust that in any argument which may be used on this question hereafter the exact position of gentlemen will always be remembered. Do not let any man inside or outside of this House charge me with advocating unjust claims against the Government. Let no man inside or outside of this House charge me with a desire to surrender my party principles; but let every man deal with me exactly according to the record. I mean precisely what I say when I repeat the words re-echoed on every republican platform, from every republican stump, wherever republican declarations have been made, that it is time this controversy between the two sections of our land should be adjusted, and that we should rise up as one people bound in one cause for the honor, the integrity, the financial credit, and commercial power and interests of a great people. For this purpose I join hands with my fellow-citizens everywhere. I am confident that the time is rapidly coming when the principles of government, the docrines of state and society which were confirmed by the war, will be kindly, fairly, and properly accepted in this land in spite of all opposition; when no further controversies over these questions will arise; but when, as in the last election, such divisions of opinion will be buried beneath the general hope and demand everywhere that the honor of the country, its financial honesty and credit, shall be undisturbed, and beneath a grand struggle that these may be secured. Thus, in all time to come, the question of American citizenship having been settled, as it must be, there will arise great, overtopping questions on which men can join hands, North and South, in one manly effort to preserve the honor and integrity of the land. I, sir, as a northern man ask for that, and for a speedy recognition of the equality and justice guaranteed now by the Constitution.

I surrender to no man on this floor in my fidelity to the principles of those who sent me here. I have advocated the doctrines of human right and suffrage, not quite so long as the gentleman from Michigan, not so long as I wish I had; but I have advocated them long enough and I have received sympathy enough from the declarations of gentlemen all over this House to know that they are rapidly becoming the great controlling laws of state and society in our country. I know there are circumstances in our political contests which would indicate that there is hostility to these doctrines, but, sir, these are incidents of violent political controversies which we must deplore and which, wherever they occur, must be speedily and firmly adjusted according to the requirements of the Constitution and the laws of this land. If this conflict is to be continued, I am ready to meet it, but I trust it may soon cease, and cease forever.

I speak, then, for my country; I speak also for my party; I speak for the doctrines presented here from the beginning by the scholars and educated men of the land; and I speak for that harmony of feeling that must come if we ever expect to restore our country to that condition which we all so much desire, and to which she is marching on, step by step, with an inevitable power which no human arm can restrain.

I have said what I wished to say as briefly as possible, laboring under a physical disability and weakness which prevents me from presenting the matter in any more elaborate form. I am sorry, I regret more than words can express, that a question of this description, a question entitled to calm and deliberate debate, has been seized here and whirled as a firebrand through this House. I regret more than words can express that it has been discussed in any but a fair, broad, liberal, national spirit. I do not object to opposition; but I do think I have a right to object to that spirit which would pervert the arguments and misrepresent the statements of those who desire to discuss all questions freely and fairly, and claim the right to differ from their associates on this floor, while standing by them in advocating that general policy of integrity, freedom, and right upon which the welfare of our people depends.

I am obliged to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] for the ten minutes which he has given me. I hope I have stated distinctly and fully what I understand to be the origin of this bill and the motives which operated upon my mind in advocating it as a national measure.

Mr. GOODE. Mr. Chairman, I will occupy only a few moments. I do not consider it at all necessary for me to reply on this occasion to the very characteristic speech made by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] If it affords that gentleman any pleasure, as it evidently does, to indulge in ill-natured flings and to pour out the vials of his impotent wrath upon the "Mother of Commonwealths," and the venerable college of William and Mary, let him enjoy it. But he may rest assured that all his envenomed shafts will fall harmless and fail to reach the mark at which they have been aimed. The time was (and I wonder the gentleman in his historical researches did not recall it)—the time was in the early days of the Republic when Virginia, in a spirit of patriotic and disinterested self-sacrifice, surrendered for the common good a vast and almost illimitable domain in the very section from which that gentleman comes, northwest of the Ohio River. But, sir, instead of cherishing a filial regard for the "Mother of Commonwealths," he seems utterly unwilling and unable to do her justice, and, like the unnatural daughter of King Lear, tries on all occasions which present themselves here to make her feel

> How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is
> To have a thankless child.

I therefore turn from the gentleman and leave him alone in his glory, knowing full well that he will never be able to soar to those heights occupied by the scholarly gentleman from Massachusetts. I leave him in the place which he has sought out for himself this morning, burrowing amid the ruins of William and Mary. I leave him there in his glory to hug to his bosom his idol of revenge and of hate, amid the hooting of bats and owls.

Mr. CONGER. I hear them now. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOODE. Yes, the gentleman heard them because he last heard himself. I say, I turn from that gentleman and leave him to hug his idol of revenge and hate, while I address myself for but a few moments to those Representatives who, like the gentleman from Massachusetts, believe that the war is over and are willing to recognize the Southern States as coequal sovereigns in a confederacy of States.

Now, what is this bill? Why should it not pass? As you have been told here it has been reported favorably by the Committee on Education and Labor at every succeeding Congress since 1870. It passed this body, largely republican then, by a decided majority in 1873. Why should it not pass? Sir, we are told it is a war claim. Why, Mr. Chairman, if it had been a war claim it would have been sent to the Committee on War Claims; but in 1870, and from that day to this, it has been uniformly referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has summed up in a few words the grounds upon which we rest the support of this bill. We ask the American Congress to restore this college, the oldest educational institution in the land save one, for the sake of the historic associations which belong to it, upon the same principle that we would repair a damage done to Mount Vernon or Independence Hall, or any other monument about which the affections and patriotic memories of our people cluster. What cares the gentleman from Michigan for all this? What cares he for the alma mater of George Washington, of Thomas Jefferson, of James Monroe, of John Tyler, of Peyton Randolph, of John Marshall, and of Winfield Scott? What cares the gentleman for the fact that upon the illustrious roll of those who drank in early life at the fountain of William and Mary are to be found the names of four signers of the Declaration of Independence, four Presidents of the United States, two eminent attorneys-general, twenty members of the House of Representatives, fifteen Senators of the United States, and a long list of distinguished officers of the Army and Navy, who have covered themselves with immortal honor and shed enduring luster upon the American name? He does not care about these things, but I trust the Representatives of the people here do.

We ask this House to restore this college for the sake of education, in order to educate the young in our land. Why, sir, nearly one hundred million acres of the public lands acquired by the common blood and the common treasure, lands held by this Government in trust for the common benefit of all the people of all the States, have been donated to your State and other new States for educational purposes. But when "the mother of States" comes, in the weeds of woe, asking the poor pittance of $65,000 to enable her to restore the oldest institution of learning in the land save one, are we to be told—I know we will be told so by the gentleman—but are we to be told by the American Congress they will turn a deaf ear to her appeal, and practically declare she is fit only to pay taxes and to bear burdens, and that all the favors of the Government are to be reserved for the new States?

The gentleman says this is a war claim. I deny it. I profess to know something at least of southern sentiment and feeling on this subject, and I tell the gentleman for the repose of his soul, [laughter,] I tell that gentleman that the people of the South do not now expect and never did expect that losses incurred by individuals as necessary incidents of the war would ever be reimbursed to them. Never! never! They went into that war, sir, with their eyes wide open, with a full knowledge of the consequences of failure. They staked everything they had on the issue of the struggle. They lost, and they accept it as the fate of war.

But the gentleman has made the wonderful legal discovery that a corporation can commit treason. He called it a nest of treason! Why? Because the faculty and students of William and Mary in our late unhappy civil strife yielded to the instincts of our common humanity and sympathized with their own kith and kin and stood by the mother who bore them. And for this he would harden his heart against those impulses which always inspire the breast of the generous conqueror. I will tell the gentleman so far as the question of war claims is concerned we will give him a receipt in full. He may put it in the bill that it is not to be regarded as a recognition of war claims so far as individuals are concerned. We put it upon the ground that it is a bill to encourage, to promote, to advance the great cause of education in our land.

But, sir, the gentleman has appeared here in a new rôle to-day and has played the part of a bulldozer. [Laughter.] He has undertaken to say from his place that there is no man here from the North, democrat or republican, who dare vote for this bill—dare was the word—who dare vote for this bill. "Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed that he hath grown so great!" [Laughter.] The testimony of eye-witnesses, now on file in the committee-room, and the statements of Colonel Campbell, General Dix, and General Meade, all show not only that the college buildings were fired and destroyed by the soldiers of the Union Army, but that it was an unnecessary and deplorable act of destruction. The numerous precedents cited by the committee in their report show that it is a well-established custom among all civilized nations to repair losses like this occurring in time of war. In other words, that civilized and Christian people do not make war upon works of art, or temples of religion, or public edifices dedicated to science and learning.

I will only say in conclusion that as chairman of the committee reporting this bill I have had the honor to receive a large number of letters from cultivated gentlemen all over the North, and I feel warranted in saying that, notwithstanding the speech of the gentleman from Michigan and his intimidation and threat here to-day, a large majority, in my judgment, of the cultivated, liberal-minded, public-spirited men all over the North, especially those who fought in the war, would hail the passage of this bill with approval and satisfaction, for the reasons so eloquently stated by my patriotic and public-spirited friend from Massachusetts.

I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE.]

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Chairman, it would be a very presumptuous thing for me to attempt to make a speech on this bill after the speeches of the eloquent gentlemen who have addressed the committee on both sides of the question. I have no wish to make a speech. I claim the attention of the committee a moment solely for the purpose of explaining the position which I occupy in regard to this measure.

It affords me no satisfaction to find that I must give a vote upon this question which does not appear to be generally approved by gentlemen on my side of the House. I fall behind no man on this side in respect for the opinions entertained by the majority of my political associates here. The opinion of my political friends always has had, and always will have, and always ought to have, great influence with me, and it only gives me pain to-day to find that I must vote differently on this subject from the way in which most of them, I suppose, will vote. But, Mr. Chairman, it so happens that a long time ago, having paid this question some attention at a time when it was not discussed from the stand-point from which it is now discussed, and having then made up my mind that this was a proper measure for me to support, and having so expressed myself, I do not find it consistent with my personal record to change my vote to-day on the question, although to my regret I find that I am differing from so many of my own side of the House.

When I was associated on the Committee on Education and Labor with the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts whose name has been mentioned on this floor to-day, [Mr. HOAR,] and who has since taken a seat at the other end of the Capitol, I at that time expressed my sympathy with him in regard to this question of doing something to repair the damage to the College of William and Mary. I have repeatedly since said to gentlemen about me that I was prepared to support the measure, and I do not feel at liberty to-day to turn against my own honestly expressed views in the past because I find that my political friends take a different view of the matter from what I do.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have it in my power to cite a single instance of legislation on the part of this House, an instance belonging to the last session of Congress, legislation which both sides of this House I believe unanimously supported, and legislation which exactly represents the feeling with which I shall vote for the proposition in regard to William and Mary. On a certain occasion in the last session of Congress the distinguished gentleman from New York, whom I do not now see in his seat, [Mr. COX,] introduced into this House a proposition to appropriate $5,000 to build a monument at the grave of Jefferson. The gentleman from New York, when he came to speak upon the question, said that he had first named $5,000, but that several prominent republicans had been over to see him and had asked him to raise it from $5,000 to $10,000, saying they would all vote to appropriate $10,000 to build a monument at Jefferson's grave. And we all did vote for it. We voted for it sincerely and heartily. We voted for it out of reverence to our own great past. We voted for it out of respect to the great history which this Republic made in former days. None of us felt any objection to it. And now, Mr. Chairman, in order that my friends may understand the feelings with which I shall vote for this bill in favor of the William and Mary college, I will say that I shall vote for this measure with exactly the same feeling with which I united with all my republican friends and all my democratic neighbors here in appropriating $10,000 to build a monument to the memory of Thomas Jefferson.

I cannot, in attempting to analyze my own feelings to-day, distinguish between the feeling with which I voted to build that monument at the last session and the feeling with which I shall vote to do something toward restoring this venerable monument which has now been under discussion. I do not discover any difference in my motives or any difference in my feelings. I am willing to vote, when it may be necessary, to aid in repairing, restoring, rebuilding any one of the most venerable of the historical monuments of the country, whether it be the monument of Bunker Hill or the Washington monument here, or the venerable monument of William and Mary, or Mount Vernon itself; I would be willing to vote money to keep any one of these venerable relics of the past in a state of preservation.

Let me add, Mr. Chairman, that the fact that William and Mary happens to be an educational monument instead of a monument at a grave does not diminish my interest in it. I have no dislike for education; I have no such feeling toward it as that I must pause right here in my liberality about keeping in repair the venerable, historical, monuments of the past. I confess frankly that the fact that it is an educational monument rather increases than diminishes my interest in it. I am quite as willing to do something to keep a venerable old college in repair as I am to keep in repair a monument over the bones of a dead statesman. It seems to me the proposition now before us is every way as worthy of us as was the proposition to repair the tomb of Jefferson.

And I would say, Mr. Chairman, to prevent all possible misunderstanding, that I have never taken the slightest interest in this bill as a war claim. I would not vote for it or say a word for it as a war claim. My friends may rest assured of that. If all that could be urged in favor of this bill was what has been said in its behalf as a war claim, I should certainly vote against it. I will vote against any measure like this, as a war claim, whenever it shall make its appearance upon this floor.

I have never even read what has been put in print in favor of this bill as a war claim, because I felt no interest in it from that point of view. I should be utterly opposed to it from that stand-point, but I am in favor of it from the stand-point I have indicated.

I wish to add that whenever what are purely southern war claims come here and are pressed in this House my republican friends will find me standing out against them as stoutly as the firmest.

I take the ground of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING,] that we do not support this measure on account of its having in it the character of a war claim; so far as that is concerned we should be utterly opposed to it. We put ourselves on record in this way, and in the future, if any man shall come to us and say you must vote for my war claim because you voted to repair William and Mary college, we will reply by saying, we gave you notice when we voted for William and Mary that we would vote against all war claims that may be brought before Congress.

I unite with my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] in saying that I would not and could not give my support to such a claim.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONROE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Ohio has said that he has not read the arguments in favor of this as a war claim. Has he taken the pains to read the title of the bill, which is: "A bill to reimburse the College of William and Mary for damages," &c.?

Mr. MONROE. I understand that the friends of the bill propose to change the title.

Mr. REED. In other words, my friend is like the deacon who was a member of a temperance society, who said he could not drink cider, but if they would call it apple juice he would drink it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONROE. I am responsible for my own position, but I am not responsible for any other man's position here. I think we sometimes commit the mistake of trying to make our friends all act upon precisely the same reasons. Because the title of the bill is not satisfactory to some of my friends that is no reason why I should vote against it when my honest conviction is that it is a right and patriotic thing to pass it. I think my friend from Maine will feel on reflection that if he occupied my stand-point and honestly believed in the bill he would not allow himself to be bluffed off from voting for it because the title is not satisfactory to some of our friends. I know the mettle of my friend from Maine; that he is not in the habit of being put down by a joke, and I tell him in all kindness that I do not mean to be put down in that way myself.

Mr. REED. I had not the slightest idea of putting the gentleman down. I was only meeting an argument which both he and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LORING] presented. He says that hereafter he is going to be foremost in opposition to the payment of war claims. I tell him that the time to fight is when the battle is going on, and not after it is over.

Mr. MONROE. That is true; but it is not worth while to begin the battle beforehand; it is not worth while to get up in the middle of the night and begin sounding the trumpet and beating the drum and making the fife scream when every honest man is quietly sleeping in his bed. [Laughter.] When the time comes, I shall hope to be as belligerent as anybody, as the gentleman from Maine or my friend from Michigan. Now I did not say I would be foremost; I said I would try to keep even with others.

No, Mr. Chairman; the fact is, I do not believe in this as a war claim, and I have a right to that opinion. I have a right to vote in accordance with my opinion, and I am going to do it. Now that is the feeling I have in regard to the matter, and I am not going to allow any man to say that I am in favor of war claims, or of depleting the Treasury, or of any of these terrible "entering-wedges," as they express it, for future war claims. I am the enemy of all such "entering-wedges." [Laughter.] I hope to be just as firm as any other man here in resisting all claims that can properly be called war claims.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to discuss this question more fully than I will be able to do in the ten minutes allowed me. In those ten minutes, if the Committee of the Whole will give its attention, I will state the propositions which in my judgment distinguish this case from every other case that has been or can be presented to this House.

I acknowledge the danger of bad precedents; God knows we have had enough of them. But I think I can show that this case of William and Mary college stands upon grounds which make it to differ from every other case that has been before it or that may come after it.

In the first place, it is not the claim of an individual; it is the claim of a corporation.

In the second place, it is not the claim of a joint-stock corporation, owned by individuals who may be responsible for crime; but it is an eleemosynary corporation, that is, a mere abstract entity, or, as the law-books state it, an ens rationis, a being of the mind, a creature of the law, in respect to which there are no persons interested as owners of its property or holders of its corporate powers; which has no power to act outside of its charter, which is its constitution; which is limited by its very being to its chartered powers in all of its actions; and in respect to which it cannot be said that its trustees, its faculty, its students, had anything to do in tainting the corporation with the crime of treason charged against them individually. Its trustees in their individual action could not, nor in their combined action could they bind or affect the corporation in anything not within the charter. Everything beyond was ultra vires and could not bind the college. Its faculty were its servants, its scholars its wards. It did not send them to the war. It could not, for its powers did not allow it. And all acts not authorized by the charter were as to the college null and void. In other words, I hold that a corporation which is not a joint-stock corporation is a thing purely of the mind, a being of the law, and is not and cannot be responsible for, because it cannot in any shape or form be chargeable with treason or with any such crime. It has no stockholders, no private owners. No individual has personal interest in it. It is a creation of law, a parasite of the State. It cannot migrate or live independent of the State or beyond the State which gave it being. It derives its vitality from the State. It is subject to the visitatorial power of the State, subject to its government, and living only through its attachment to the State.

I take another ground which distinguishes this case from others: the building destroyed was a seat of learning and science.

The law of nations is a bundle of customs, based on international usage, the decisions of courts of admiralty, the opinions of publicists, and the treaties between nations. These customs, as the civil law says, are based on universal consent, and "put on the character of law." The Constitution of the United States (Article 1, section 8, clause 10) gives power to Congress "to define and punish piracies and felonies on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations." The Constitution thus recognizes the law of nations as a part of the public law of the United States—a part of their own fundamental law. By that law even the red hand of war cannot touch an institution of learning without crime, which Congress is empowered to punish. This Government has again and again appealed to this legal principle, notably in the destruction of the Capitol in the war of 1812, for its own security. Wheaton says, page 423:

> By the modern usage of nations, which has now acquired the force of law, temples of religion, public edifices devoted to civil purposes only, monuments of art, and repositories of science, are exempted from the general operations of war. (Wheaton's International Law, 46.)

Phillimore and Halleck speak to the same effect. How can this Government in war violate that law which the Constitution has recognized as binding on it and has empowered Congress to punish those who violate it? I take higher ground. This case differs from all others (I beg the attention of gentlemen to this) in the fact that Virginia of all the States in the Southern Confederacy was the only State that had a government that was recognized by the Government of the United States as a legal and loyal government. The government for the State of Virginia was restored at the city of Wheeling in June, 1861. That government at Wheeling in May, 1862, consented to the partition of Virginia. By the act of Congress, passed in December, 1862, based upon that consent of Virginia, West Virginia was conditionally admitted into the Union, and in May, 1863, was fully and absolutely admitted into the Union. Virginia thus consented in May, 1862, the very date at which General McClellan's army took possession of William and Mary college, and without that consent West Virginia could not have been a State. This Government, therefore, is estopped to deny that the government of Virginia at Wheeling was a loyal and legal and regular government of that State as a State in the Union. If it was not, the whole proceeding for the partition of Virginia was a nullity, and West Virginia is not now a State. As the Federal Government cannot deny that West Virginia is a State, it is equally estopped to deny the legality of the government of Virginia at Wheeling; for, by the Constitution, the State of West Virginia could not have been formed out of the State of Virginia without the consent of the Legislature of Virginia. (Art. 4, section 3.)

When, therefore, the troops of this Government took possession of the College of William and Mary, they took possession of an institution of learning under the guardian care and clinging to the breast of a loyal mother, according to your own concession. And the Government was as much bound to protect that institution from burning as it would be bound if it took possession of Harvard University to-day. And if by the negligent use of the building, if by the wanton action of its troops, that property was destroyed, the Government is as much bound in law for that to the people of Virginia as it would be legally bound for the wanton destruction of Harvard University to-day if it was taken possession of and destroyed by the troops of the Government.

The Government took possession, for its use without rent and, as far as appears, without consent, of the property of an institution of learning sacred by international law from the profane touch of war; an institution clinging to and under the guardian and maternal care of a loyal and legal State government; and that property situated in territory which, from May, 1862, to the end of the war, was in the possession of Federal troops.

No gentleman on the other side will deny that with the advance of the Federal Army, the Constitution, like the pillar of cloud and fire, went before and with it. It is true the power to suppress insurrection is given by the Constitution, but its constitutional exercise can only consist with the observance of the constitutional duties prescribed in other clauses of that instrument. One of these clauses is as follows:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, * * * against domestic violence.

How can this Government, thus constitutionally bound to protect against invasion, become itself the invader and destroy the property of a college of a loyal and legal State government? How can it promote domestic violence when bound to defend the State against it? How can this Government, that, in the language of Macbeth, should against the murderer shut the door, not bear the knife itself, instead of preventing arson become itself the incendiary, and refuse compensation for the ruin it produced?

Look at another clause. In the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which is a limitation on Federal power, (Barron vs. City of Baltimore, 7 Peters, Milligan's case, 4 Wallace,) it is provided that no person "shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

In this case property was taken without due process of law. It was taken for public use and destroyed without just compensation. Can that compensation now be justly denied?

The United States was a bailee without hire, bound to extraordinary care. Its agents destroyed the property. Is not the Government bound to compensate? Gentlemen have cited cases to show the contrary. I need cite no cases to show that any private person under like circumstances would be liable. (See 22 N. Y. Reports, 355.) But a number of cases have been cited to show that this Government is not liable under like circumstances: Gibbons vs. U. S., 8 Wallace, 269; U. S. vs. Gill, 20 Wall., 517; Russell vs. U. S., 5 Court of Claims Cases, 121; Flushing Ferry Co. vs. U. S., 6 Court of Claims Cases, 1.

Some of these cases turned upon the point that in cases of tort the Court of Claims had no jurisdiction, and that such cases are reserved for the decision of Congress. In some the dictum of Judge Story, in his work on Agency, sec. 319, is relied on, which declared that no government was liable for the laches, misfeasance, or trespass of its officers, a dictum based on authorities the learned author refers to, which do not go further than that such acts will not discharge the liability of parties to the Government, and do not refer to the liability of Government to other parties. But in Russell vs. U. S., and U. S. vs. Gill, supra, the Government was held liable for the destruction and damage of property taken possession of, under its authority, by its agents; and in the late case of Clark vs. U. S., 2 Otto, the court says, per Justice Bradley:

> We do not mean to say that where a parol contract has been wholly or partially executed and performed on one side, the party performing will not be entitled to recover the fair value of his property or services. On the contrary, we think that he will be entitled to recover such value as upon an implied contract for a quantum meruit. In the present case, the implied contract is such as arises upon a simple bailment for hire, and the obligations of the parties are those which are incidental to such a bailment. The special contract being void, the claimant is thrown back upon the rights which result from the implied contract. This will cast the loss of the vessel upon him. A bailee for hire is only responsible for ordinary diligence and liable for ordinary negligence in the care of the property bailed. This is not only the common law but the general law on the subject. (See Jones on Bailments, p. 88; Story on Bailments, secs. 398, 399; Domat, Lois Civiles, lib. I, tit. iv., sec. 3, par. 3, 4; Bell's Com., vol. I, pp. 481, 483, 7th ed.)
> As negligence is not attributed to the employés of the Government in this case, the loss of the vessel, as before stated, must fall on the owner.
> Of course the claimant is entitled to the value of the use of his vessel during the time it was in the hands of the Government agents, which, as shown by the findings, was the period of eight days.

If, then, the Government, as bailee for hire, would be responsible to the owner for destruction of property hired, how can it escape liability as a bailee by seizure without hire when its own soldiers destroyed the property?

The case of Flushing Ferry Co. vs. U. S., cited and relied on by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] has no application. It simply decided the Government was not liable for loss of a vessel because it appointed a bad pilot and did not keep up a buoy, for neither of which could it be liable to judgment in the Court of Claims, or be justly liable at all; because no government is properly responsible for the fidelity of its officials, and this Government is not bound to keep up buoys.

I maintain, therefore, that under the Constitution, and under the law of nations recognized in the Constitution, this Government is legally and equitably liable for the wanton destruction of this venerable college by its own soldiers, in possession under the orders of the Government.

Now, sir, I say that these three points differentiate this case from every other case that can be presented; in that it is a college under the guardian care of a loyal State government of the Union; in that it was a college, an eleemosynary and not a joint-stock corporation, that could not and did not commit treason; and in that as an eleemosynary institution and not a joint-stock corporation it was, under the international law of civilized mankind, sacred from destruction and entitled to the vigilant protecting care of every foreign belligerent, and a fortiori under that of a government constitutionally bound to guard its venerable buildings from injury through the negligence or wantonness of the troops of the United States even in the midst of civil strife. It will be seen that these grounds upon which I put this case furnish no precedent for action by the Government in respect to the so-called southern war claims of private persons. I do not mean to say that the Government is responsible for all these individual claims, far from it. I agree with my colleague that the people of the South are just as tired of the mass of southern claims presented here as any other part of this country. I will stand at the door of the Treasury and protect it against any of these claims that are not based upon legal and equitable grounds. [Laughter on the republican side.] I repeat "upon legal and equitable grounds." Do gentlemen on the other side who laugh deny that there is a responsibility based on equity as well as on law.

A MEMBER. Who is to determine equity?

Mr. TUCKER. Who is to determine equity? We are. Congress is capable of making the proper discrimination upon which the liability of the Government should depend.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another ground that I rest this case upon; and I must hurry on; I can only state my propositions; I cannot argue them. How can this Government as one of the civilized nations of the earth say to foreign nations with whom we may engage in war hereafter: "When you tread our soil, our institutions of learning are safe even from the incendiarism of war;" how can we say that when we have burned down an institution of our own in civil war, and then refuse to pay for it? If we justify this Government in burning an institution of learning under the guardianship of our Constitution, and our refusal to pay for our own destruction, how can we condemn a foreign power in doing the same thing in a public war? Are we not estopped to plead the principles of international law against such an act by a foreign nation when we have set such a precedent by our own action in this case? I warn gentlemen that we are making a bad precedent against our own highest interests as a member of the society of nations. We are teaching bloody instructions which, being taught, will return to plague the inventors. As a civilized nation we are bound to stand out before the world and say that in public war, as in civil war, where a government destroys an institution of learning by wantonness or negligence on the part of its custodians it is bound to compensate the owner, bound by international law in the case of a foreign war; by international law, by the Constitution of the United States, by the law of civilized humanity, and by the law of God in the case of a civil war.

A great deal has been said about this old institution and about its venerable character. I have some feeling on that subject. My ancestors for two generations back drank at its fountains of learning. One hundred years ago and more my grandfather was converted to the principles of republicanism there, and, renouncing his allegiance to the country of his birth, stood as an officer of the Revolution with the defenders of our liberties at the surrender of Yorktown. My father, my uncles, and kindred were trained there. The institution therefore is one that fastens itself upon my affections. But look at its alumni. The greatest jurist of the land, the greatest expounder of the Constitution, John Marshall, was an alumnus of William and Mary. Winfield Scott, one of our greatest warriors; Jefferson, the sage of Monticello; Madison of Montpelier—these and others whom I could name by the score were trained for their high duties by this noble Alma Mater, and, having shed luster upon the annals of our country by their splendid lives, come here and in mute appeal from a higher sphere than this claim that we shall rebuild this old institution and raise it from its ashes for a career of future usefulness no less glorious than it has wrought in its past history.

I pray you, gentlemen, to remember that this is no precedent for war claims, but a simple demand of justice to old Virginia. She comes not here to boast, as gentlemen have charged in this debate. I do not notice the harsh, the illiberal, the ungenerous expressions which have been used in the discussion of this question; but when gentlemen make this charge, I reply that she does not boast of the glory of her sons more than other States do, or in disparagement of the just pride of other States in their distinguished men.

It has been said by a great man that she is like the mother of the Gracchi: when asked for her jewels she points to her sons. Standing at the grave of her mighty and illustrious dead who have been trained at this institution of learning, she may well point her living sons to their tombs and to the memorable records of their lives to show how they have trodden the fields of glory and done immortal honor to her and to the Union, and say to them with tender pride: "Go, follow their noble examples." Respicere exemplar vitæ morumque jubebo.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now proceed to read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, the sum of $65,000 out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse said college for the destruction of its buildings and other property destroyed without authority by disorderly soldiers of the United States during the late war: Provided, That no moneys be so paid except upon accounts of such destruction, and the damage caused thereby, duly verified and proven.

During the reading of the bill,

Mr. PHILLIPS said: I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order until the reading of the bill is concluded.

The reading of the bill being concluded,

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend by striking out the words "disorderly soldiers of the United States."

Mr. PHILLIPS. I believe my motion has precedence.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is bound to recognize the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the enacting clause struck out.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion that the committee rise cannot be combined with the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move, then, to strike out the enacting clause.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. PHILLIPS, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 79, noes 82.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BURCHARD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 189) to reimburse the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, for property destroyed during the late war, and had directed him to report the same to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. GOODE. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York, Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 87, nays 127, not voting 75; as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 11, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, it hath pleased Thee once more to lay the heavy hand of death upon the membership of this body. In the midst of an active, useful, and honorable life a member of this House has been called hence. O God, our Father, our Creator, our Preserver, our Redeemer, we bow before Thee in submission to all acts of Thy providence, and we pray, we implore Thy mercy upon us. O God, minister by Thy gracious spirit's influence to those who have been so suddenly bereaved by this affliction, and do Thou teach us who remain so to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.

May it please Thee, our Father, to spare the members of this House. O God, may their health and their lives be precious in Thy sight. Enable them to discharge their duties to the people whom they represent, and may they ever have Thee in remembrance, that they may fear God and walk in the ways of righteousness.

Bless the presiding officer and the members of this House and of the Senate, the President and the Vice-President of the United States, and all departments of the Government and all sections of our country. May God's blessing rest upon us ever. These and all gifts of Thy providence and grace we ask in the name of Jesus Christ, our Redeemer. Amen.

Ketchum and other women, of Saint Joseph County, Michigan, praying for the passage of an act making effective the anti-polygamy law of 1862; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of a large number of citizens of the State of Vermont, (I should think several hundred from the size of the roll,) at the head of which stands the usual printed form of petition about the arrears of pension bill. I ask that this paper lie on the table. As a kind of commentary upon the value of the sacred right of petition of this sort, I may mention that some of the gentlemen who have sent in petitions have inclosed me the authority under which they got them up. Here is one of these communications to get up petitions, signed by a claim agent who says that he gives special attention to rejected claims, in which he says:

DEAR SIR: I inclose a petition to the Senate of the United States to which I wish you to get a few names and send them to Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS, United States Senator. Please get twelve to twenty names, with the residence, signed, and send to the above address as quick as possible.

The value of petitions got up in that way, Mr. President, I do not know is of the very highest.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. EATON presented the petition of Hoyt Dibble and others, citizens of Danbury, Connecticut, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of James Eveleth, praying compensation for his services during the late war as disbursing agent for the defenses of Washington City, and for his services as disbursing agent of the engineer department since the termination of that service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KERNAN. I present twenty-six memorials, signed by persons residing in different counties in the State of New York, and some in Massachusetts, some in Pennsylvania, and some in New Jersey, remonstrating against the renewal of the patent issued to L. J. Mabie, A. J. Manly and R. H. Morris, as assignees of Nathaniel Jones, the inventor of an improvement in shoe-lasts. I move the reference of these memorials to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

He also presented the petition of Milton W. Triplett, late corporal Company F, Fifth Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers, praying indemnity for a horse lost in the military service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KERNAN. I present the petition of R. R. Crowley, of Randolph, Cattaraugus County, New York, and a large number of other persons, some of whom I know. The petition prays for the passage of a law to provide for the payment of arrears of pensions. I wish to say that while some of the petitions I receive are very likely gotten up and sent around to be signed in the manner stated, yet a large number of petitions come from people who take an interest in this subject, supplemented by letters from women, and from men who say they are lame soldiers, from all over my State, which make me feel that there is an honest desire on the part of the people interested to have early action on this bill. I am frank to say that I believe where there are pensions granted they should run from the time when the pensioners were disabled. I move that this petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of A. B. Mullett, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying compensation for certain services rendered by him while acting as Supervising Architect of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, presented the petition of Marie M. Diener and other women, of Secor, Woolford County, Illinois, praying for the passage of an act making effective the anti-polygamy law of 1862; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the petition of E. A. Barber and others, citizens of Allen County, Kansas; the petition of W. H. Broadwell and others, citizens of Kansas; the petition of William Taylor and others, citizens of Kansas; and the petition of Frank Evans and others, citizens of Kansas, praying for the passage of the bill (H. MISSOURI JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. THURMAN. The Committee on the Judiciary have instructed me to call the attention of the Senate to an entry in the Journal of the Senate of the 14th of June, 1878, indefinitely postponing the bill (H. R. No. 5067) to divide the western district of Missouri into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes. The Journal shows that Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, reported the bill from the Committee on the Judiciary adversely, and with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, and that it was so postponed. That was an entire mistake. The committee never came to any such conclusion nor did that Senator ever make any such report. The mistake, no doubt, occurred by a page taking to the Clerk's desk the wrong bill. I am instructed by the committee to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that that entry in the Journal be rescinded. The committee at this session have unanimously reported the bill favorably, and recommended its passage with an amendment; but this entry stands in the way of the action of the committee. The entry that it was reported against and the consequent order that the bill be indefinitely postponed was an entire mistake.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill remained in the possession of the committee during the entire time?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir, during the entire time. I ask unanimous consent to have the entry rescinded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this there can be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senate will recollect that I tried to get that bill from the Judiciary Committee, and made a motion to have the committee discharged in order to bring the bill before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is no question about it. I refused to report it at the instance of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, the Senator from Illinois refused to report it.

Mr. THURMAN. I should be glad if the Senate would take the bill up, to which I am sure there is no objection, and which the committee unanimously reported, and pass it this morning, as it ought to be passed at once if it is to pass at all.

Mr. SPENCER. Let us get through with the morning business first.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Ohio for the purpose indicated by him as soon as the business of the morning hour shall have been concluded.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 823) for the relief of the assignee in bankruptcy of Robert Erwin and Erwin & Hardee, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1215) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Erwin," reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. THURMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2301) fixing the compensation of jurors serving in the district and circuit courts of the United States, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. INGALLS. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a letter from the managers and officers of the Women's Christian Association of the District of Columbia, submitting the eighth annual report of the association, and asking further appropriations in aid of the work thereof, to report it back, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and they recommend that the prayer be granted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on the District of Columbia will be discharged from its further consideration and the paper referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 643) for the relief of Thomas Lucas, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3625) relating to soldiers while in the civil service of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I ask leave to make a report from the Joint Committee on the Library. The House of Representatives referred to that committee the report of the Secretary of the Interior touching the price and cost of certain squares near the Capitol. The committee, having considered that, have authorized me to report the bill which I hold in my hand. I am not authorized to say that the committee recommend the passage of this bill; I am authorized to say the committee recommend the Senate either to amend or to pass this bill. It is only one of the many propositions for the construction and location of a library building which have been considered here and elsewhere for several years. It was thought necessary to submit some proposition. There are several different propositions, which have their friends on the committee, and we considered that one was about as good as another for the purpose of amending; and this is the one that I am authorized to report to the Senate.

I want to say, furthermore, that as early as I think the business of the Senate will justify, I shall ask the Senate to consider this bill.

The bill (S. No. 1591) to provide additional accommodations for the Library of Congress was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Henry C. De Ahna, late collector of customs for the district of Alaska, praying compensation for services rendered, reported a bill (S. No. 1592) for the relief of Henry C. De Ahna, late collector of customs at Sitka, Alaska; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAWES. I am unanimously instructed by the committee to say to the Senate that there are some very pressing reasons why the committee would ask the Senate to pass upon this bill at once. I think it will take no time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Massachusetts upon the conclusion of the morning business. First he will recognize the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

BILLS INTRODUCED.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL and Mr. PLUMB submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes herein named; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORT ON FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed 5,000 extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1877-'78, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries; the illustrations to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

NATIONAL MUSEUM BUILDING.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1574) for the erection of a fire-proof building for the National Museum. It will not take five minutes when the bill is explained.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $250,000 for a fire-proof building for the use of the National Museum, three hundred feet square, to be erected under the direction and supervision of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in accordance with the plans now on file with the Joint Committee of Public Buildings and Grounds, on the southeast corner of the grounds of the Smithsonian Institution. The building is to be placed east of the Smithsonian Institution, leaving a roadway between it and the latter of not less than fifty feet, with its north front on a line with the south face of the buildings of the Agricultural Department and of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it will be remembered that a bill similar to this passed the Senate unanimously two years ago. It was not reached in season in the House to be acted upon regularly, and could only be considered by that body under a suspension of the rules. The motion to suspend the rules for that purpose received a very large majority there, but not quite a two-third vote. The bill has been recommended by the committees of both Houses, I believe, unanimously.

It will also be remembered that we made an appropriation for the centennial celebration of a million and a half dollars, and that sum was repaid to the United States; but the contributions made by the United States cost the Government about $150,000. In addition to these contributions we have, of thirty-four States and nationalities out of forty-one, their entire contributions made at the centennial celebration. These contributions are now stored in the armory, four stories high, there being four thousand boxes packed as full as the armory can hold. It was naturally supposed by the governments which made these very generous contributions to the United States that they would be placed where the public could see them. We have immense riches in this line. The results of over two hundred exploring expeditions are now garnered in this city in various localities, but without the possibility of their being properly exhibited.

Mr. President, I suppose that the contributions of some of these States that were given to us, say of Siam, China, and Japan, will at the present moment, when properly displayed, occupy more space than the largest hall in the Smithsonian Institution, and must have cost those governments a very large sum of money, perhaps over $100,000. The contributions that come to us from abroad and from our various States and Territories, are specially rich and valuable in iron, silver, and gold ores, especially those of Norway, Sweden, Russia, Spain, Portugal, Brazil, Australia, and New Zealand, and our own contributions are exceedingly valuable in ores, metals, coals, building-stones, earth and clays for the potters' art, including all the economical products of the animal kingdom, as furs, hides, skins, preparations of fish and marine products, all the apparatus with which these animals were captured and utilized, generally whatever illustrates animal and mineral nature throughout the United States, and also a complete illustration of the Indian tribes, costing about $40,000. These are not merely curiosities, but they are specimens of objects that will be permanently interesting and useful to the whole country.

I may say that the contributions from the extreme eastern states, from Siam, Japan, and China, including bronzes of rare workmanship, could not have cost less, as I have said, than $100,000. At the present time, in the basement of the Smithsonian Institution, there is three times as much stored away as is on exhibition. I may say also that there are five pieces alone that were given to us from the centennial exposition upon which the actual cost or the estimate of the custom-house department upon their value was $48,000. They are now publishing a volume containing a list of what they have of animal products and products of the fisheries, where the title, occupying but a single line, will fill three hundred and fifty pages, and this is only one branch of the extensive collection which is to find a place in the new building proposed.

I suppose, Mr. President, that every Senator who has made any sort of investigation of this subject agrees as to the propriety of this building being erected for the purpose of accommodating these large results of our exploring expeditions and of the centennial exposition, and the various collections belonging to the Government that are now gathered together in this city. The building will occupy a space on the east of the Smithsonian Institution, and will only cost $250,000, and it is to be under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to call the attention of my colleague to the seventh and eighth lines of the bill, where in speaking of the location of the building it reads that it is to be located "on the southeast corner of the grounds of the Smithsonian Institution." That taken literally might seem to require that it be located exactly in the southeast corner, which is not intended, as can be seen further along. But to make it clear, I suggest to him to make it read, to be located "on the southeastern part of the grounds of the Smithsonian Institution," to save all possible question.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this there can be no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FUNERAL OF REPRESENTATIVE SCHLEICHER.

Mr. G. M. ADAMS, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared at the bar of the Senate and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to communicate to the Senate a resolution of the House inviting the Senate to attend the funeral ceremonies of Hon. GUSTAVE SCHLEICHER, late a Representative from the State of Texas, to be held in the Hall of the House of Representatives at three o'clock p. m. this day.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senate now to consider House bill No. 5067.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It seems to me that we ought to hear what this communication from the House of Representatives is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported.

The resolution of the House of Representatives was read by the Secretary, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 13, 1879.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know that according to our usage we ought to do any more business now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think we ought, in respect of decent appearance, to say nothing of the reality.

Mr. THURMAN. In that case I will give notice simply that to-morrow morning I shall ask the Senate to take up this bill at the end of the morning hour, or during the morning hour, and to pass it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That, pursuant to the invitation of the House of Representatives, the Senate will attend the funeral ceremony of Hon. GUSTAVE SCHLEICHER, late a member of the House of Representatives, to be held in the Hall of the House this day at three o'clock, and that the Senate now take a recess till five minutes to three.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously.

The Senate (at twelve o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) took a recess until five minutes to three o'clock p. m.; and was again called to order at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will now proceed in a body to the House of Representatives.

The Senate proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives, headed by the Vice-President and Secretary, and preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Senate returned to its Chamber at three o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.

The VICE-PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at three o'clock and fifty-one minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

THE LATE HON. GUSTAVE SCHLEICHER.

Mr. SWANN. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to present a report and resolution in reference to the death of our late colleague, Mr. GUSTAVE SCHLEICHER.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs desire to place upon its record its appreciation of the kindly qualities and analytic intellect of their late member, Hon. GUSTAVE SCHLEICHER.

Its members unanimously express their mature judgment of his unexampled merits and honest statesmanship, and his devotion to his State and his constituents, evidenced by his assiduity and labors in the sessions of this committee and reported to this Congress.

To show their unfeigned regret and sympathy to the country, to the State of Texas, and to the bereaved family, and to do this in such a way as to make this testimonial worthy and substantial: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That in consequence of the large family of the deceased and of the condition of his estate, the House be requested to make the customary appropriation of the balance of the salary which would be due to him, as a member of the Forty-fifth Congress, and that the next Congress, to which he was elected, be respectfully requested to make a similar appropriation of the salary which would have been due to him as a member of the Forty-sixth Congress.

The resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs was unanimously adopted.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the funeral ceremonies of Hon. GUSTAVE SCHLEICHER, late a Representative from the State of Texas, be had in the Hall of the House at three o'clock p. m. this day, and that the Senate of the United States be requested to attend.

The resolution was adopted unanimously.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I move that the House take a recess until five minutes before three o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at twelve o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) took a recess until five minutes before three o'clock p. m.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

At five minutes to three o'clock the House reassembled.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. GUSTAVE SCHLEICHER, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the resolution of the House of Representatives providing for the appointment of a joint committee to take order for superintending the funeral and to escort the remains of the deceased to San Antonio, Texas.

Ordered, That Mr. COKE, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. HAMLIN be the committee on the part of the Senate.

Resolved, That, pursuant to the invitation of the House of Representatives, the Senate will attend the funeral ceremonies of Hon. GUSTAVE SCHLEICHER, late a member of the House of Representatives, to be held in the Hall of the House this day at three o'clock, and that the Senate now take a recess until five minutes to three o'clock.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. BACON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the families of members of the House who are unable to obtain seats in the gallery appropriated to them be admitted to occupy seats upon the floor of the House.

FUNERAL SERVICES OVER THE REMAINS OF MR. SCHLEICHER.

At three o'clock the Senate of the United States, preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms and headed by the Vice-President of the United States, with the Secretary, the Chief-Justice, and associate justices of the Supreme Court, and the President of the United States and the members of his Cabinet, entered the Hall, were properly announced, and were then conducted to the seats assigned them.

At eight minutes past three o'clock the casket containing the remains was brought into the Hall, preceded by the committee of arrangements and the Senators and Representatives from Texas.

The Chaplain of the House, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D., read selections from the Gospel according to St. John, the book of Job, the first epistle to Timothy, and from the ninetieth psalm.

He then offered the following prayer:

Almighty, everlasting God, our Heavenly Father, Thou hast summoned from our midst another member of this House of Representatives. His days upon earth are numbered. He has entered into the eternal world.

O God, our Father, help us to number our days, for they are but few. A few days hence and the places that know us now will know us no more forever.

O God, let Thy truth sink deep into our hearts. Teach us thy law. Give us a reverent spirit, that we may obey Thy precepts and serve Thee and love Thee with all our minds and hearts and strength.

O Infinite Spirit, do Thou in compassion look upon the widow and fatherless children of our deceased friend.

O God, we cannot enter into their sorrow. We cannot fully sympathize with their pain and anguish. Do Thou soothe and comfort them.

O Infinite Spirit, do Thou prepare us for a life of usefulness henceforth, so that when in the valley of the shadow of death we shall be called to pass, Thy rod and Thy staff may support us into eternal life at Thy right hand. Guide us, through Jesus Christ, our Redeemer. Amen.

The Chaplain next read selections from the fifteenth chapter of the first epistle of Saint Paul to the Corinthians, and afterward addressed the House as follows:

Again, my hearers, are we assembled to perform a mournful duty. The body of GUSTAVE SCHLEICHER, late a Representative from the State of Texas, lies before us.

It becomes us in speaking of his memory to deal kindly and lovingly and truthfully. He was a man of remarkable characteristics, and some of these I shall venture to-day to mention as eminently worthy of praise and of imitation.

Born in the city of Darmstadt, in Germany, educated at the university of Giessen, in the Grand Duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, at a very early period of his life he manifested peculiar scientific abilities as a civil engineer, and became an assistant in the construction of several railroads in Europe.

At the age of twenty-three he came to America, spending some time upon the southwestern frontiers of the United States. In the year 1850 he located at San Antonio, in Texas. In three years from that date we find him a representative in the Legislature of that State, and certainly no small tribute is this fact to his eminent abilities. To acquire a foreign tongue; to become so prepared in this foreign language as thoroughly to comprehend the civil institutions, the political principles, and to represent a constituency as a legislator, is assuredly a very high compliment; and when it is accomplished in so short a period, when, rising to the second house, the highest body of the State Legislature, a member of the senate, he was ultimately chosen to represent a district of Texas in the Congress of the United States.

Only those who understand from personal experience the difficulties involved in the mastery of the English language by one born in a foreign land can truly appreciate the energy, the patience and earnestness, the zeal, the steady application which paved the way to his eminent success.

It is my privilege to speak of some characteristics of our departed friend that I have already named as worthy of praise and of imitation. Respect for law, a spirit of obedience to law, is essential to the perpetuity of a free government.

Respect for the law of the land depends in a very large measure upon popular esteem and respect for the men who make the law, and he who unsettles this confidence, he who contributes to diminish the faith of the people in the purity, in the wisdom, in the integrity, and in the honor of her law-makers and the executors of her law, does permanent injury to the country and ineffaceable wrong to society.

It has been a stigma, my countrymen, which we have been compelled to confess in a large measure to be just, that in the political contests that from time to time have been waged in our land, from the discussion of high and important principles of administration and of state policy, men have descended to personal vituperation and abuse; and these examples have been carried into the public prints, until in many sections of our land no character is so pure, no integrity so unquestionable, no honesty so evident that they will not be assailed by the tongue of detraction.

The man who lies before you never contributed in this direction a word or an act. He never felt that it was necessary, in order to compass his own success, to destroy the private character of a competitor. But as he felt himself to be actuated by principles of honesty and integrity, he recognized these in his opponent; and as a gentleman conscious of his own honor, so he regarded those who differed from him in sentiment.

This example I consider eminently worthy of universal imitation. Would that the restraints that are felt in this House, the requirements of parliamentary usage, could be everywhere observed in the discussions that excite the people throughout our land. To maintain respect for authority, to maintain confidence in the ability and incorruptibility of public men, to maintain a living faith in their purity of purpose, these are essential principles, and they lie at the very base of our future fortunes, and must form our hope for the stability and perpetuity of the institutions of this country.

A second qualification which I shall notice, an admirable quality in our deceased friend, was his eminent love of truth and a patient, earnest, untiring spirit of investigation. He spared no labor, he yielded to no inducements of ease, but gave himself wholly, to the full extent of his great natural powers, to the investigation of the problems that came before him and every subject that demanded his attention.

So thoroughly was his heart absorbed in his public duty that in the moments of delirium, when the mortal body to and fro was being tossed about, and the cords were being rapidly broken one by one that bound him to mortal life, even then his mind was upon his public work, in his daily duties, investigating, deciding, acting in the delirium of the hour.

Another and eminently characteristic feature in our deceased friend's character was his immovable and invincible resolution. When he believed himself to be right, whether in a vast majority or standing single and alone, if he believed himself to be right he was immovable. No matter what the issue might be, nor how much his position might endanger his personal fortunes and prospects, he followed the lead of his conscience and stood firm to the convictions of his intellect.

Statesmen ought to lead public opinion, not to follow it. They who give all time and labor and thought to the great principles of administrative government, they who do this with intelligence, with ability, with zeal, will be competent to lead the judgments of the people.

Our departed friend was a loving husband, a kind, indulgent father; generous to a fault, careless to his injury in his temporal interests. Free and large as his manly person was the great heart that beat within this cold body. The generous emotion, the tender feeling, the consciousness which enters into distress and sympathizes and rises higher than the emotion of pity and takes compassion upon distress and bears part of its burden, these he knew.

And thus in the midst of a useful life, a life of patient toil, of undivided devotion to his adopted country's interests, he has passed away. His memory will endure. May the example which he left in these high and noble characteristics of statesmanship be a guide to others.

So remembering him, may we in like steadfastness to duty, with like zeal and patient investigation into truth, with like strength of resolution and manliness of purpose, adhere to the convictions of right, and so shall we serve our country and serve our God.

When these few days of mortal life shall have passed away, O Infinite Spirit, into the light of eternal day guide us, into the presence of the eternal God, in the bliss of the eternal state.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate, then offered the following prayer:

Under the shade, O Lord, under the deep dark shade of Thy clouds, thickening one upon another, behold Thou all these Thy servants assembled here again to-day. The sweet light of the world is all around us; and yet Thou hast wrapped us in the darkness of sorrow again and again.

What meanest Thou, O Lord God Almighty, our Father in Heaven, to speak thus unto Thy children, for that they consider the time that we spend our years as a tale that is told. Oh, out of the frailty of nature and out of the fever of life, yea, and from the apathy and the destruction of death itself, we beseech Thee to lift up the souls of Thy servants, that while their time is flowing on, and while the turmoil of the world is ever arising around them, they may by the inspiration of faith catch some glimpses of the great headlands, some glimpses of the immortal life that is yet to be unfolded to us.

And now, O Lord, our God, be graciously pleased to compassionate the sad circle on whom this fresh trouble has so bitterly fallen. To the sacred memory and the tender grief for him with whom they now part, add Thou the peace of trust and the comfort of hope. Be graciously pleased to go away with them on their desolate journey as they shall bear him hence forever, and bedew so oft his distant grave with their tears. We commend them to Thee, and we pray, Heavenly Father, that Thou wilt remember to-day those members of this House who are not here to mingle in this funeral scene, but who linger in their chambers of sickness. O God, if it pleases Thee, restore them to their places in this Hall.

And now again we invoke Thy blessings upon Thy servants, the President of the United States and upon all the rulers of this land. O gracious God, the God of our fathers, and our God, and the God of our children and children's children, Thou art trying us in the furnace of affliction, in our persons, in our families, in our nation. We beseech Thee lead us by a simple childlike faith to cleave evermore unto Thee; and do Thou dwell with us and be our Immanuel forever, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The benediction having been pronounced by the Chaplain of the House, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, the remains of the deceased were then removed from the Hall, to be conveyed to San Antonio, Texas, followed by the Texas delegation and the committee of arrangements.

The President of the United States, the members of the Cabinet, the Chief-Justice and associate justices of the Supreme Court, the Vice-President, and the members of the Senate then retired from the Hall.

Mr. HOOKER. In order to enable the members and officers of the House to accompany the remains of him whose funeral ceremonies have just been performed here to the railroad depot, I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed 1,000 copies of the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition for sale by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, at the cost of publication with 10 per cent. added thereto.

RAILROADS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inquire and report to the Senate at as early a day as practicable what railroad company, individual or individuals, if any, are constructing or building a railroad through the public domain in the Territory of Arizona, and under and by what authority the same is being constructed or built.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. ANTHONY. We are far into the closing session of the present Congress, and there are many bills upon the Calendar that are unobjected to, which have gone through all the preliminary stages of legislation, and many of them have passed the House of Representatives. I think it is time that we should take them up. I therefore offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That on Friday next, at one o'clock, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless, upon motion, the Senate should at any time otherwise order; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Rhode Island does not propose to interfere with the appropriation bills, I take it?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I make the inquiry because the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is not in his seat at present.

Mr. ANTHONY. Nothing interferes with appropriation bills here.

Mr. WITHERS. I call the attention of the mover of the resolution to what I consider a defect in it, and that is permitting an objection to be interposed at any time during the progress of the bill. It seems to me if an objection is to be interposed at all, it ought to be at first. After the Senate shall have taken up a bill and possibly considered it for an hour under the five-minute rule it is to be placed in the power of a Senator then to interpose an objection and cause the bill to go over, as I understand the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the way the rule has always been observed. The objection, if there is objection, would naturally be made at the beginning; but if it is found that a bill is to occupy the whole day, it is better to postpone it even after half an hour or an hour spent in its consideration than to let it go on till the adjournment.

Mr. WITHERS. I think it likely to produce a necessarily greater consumption of time than the rule I suggest. That is my impression.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the way the rule has always been observed, and I think it has given better satisfaction to the Senate than if the rule required the objection to be confined to the beginning of the consideration of a bill.

The resolution was agreed to.

BEN. HOLLADAY.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to give notice of my intention to call up the bill (S. No. 1398) for the relief of Ben. Holladay at a very early day. I desire to premise the notice by a remark or two, if the Senate will indulge me. I shall make a single remark, as I do not wish to detain my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] who has given notice that he will occupy the floor at the conclusion of the morning business.

The memorial of Mr. Holladay was before the Committee on Claims at the first session of this Congress. On the 26th day of November, 1877, the committee submitted a report to the Senate sending the case to the Court of Claims; but after a discussion of some two or three days, at different times in the Senate, the Senate recommitted the case to the committee by the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill referring the claim of Benjamin Holladay to the Court of Claims be recommitted to the Committee on Claims, with instructions to report to the Senate what amount, if any, is equitably due the claimant on account of his claim; and the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and take testimony.

Under that instruction the Committee on Claims has investigated this claim thoroughly, and in a manner different from any claim that has ever been investigated by that committee since I have been a member of it; that is to say, it called witnesses and examined them under oath. On the 13th of June, 1878, in compliance with the instructions of the Senate, the Committee on Claims reported a bill to the Senate, which is on the Calendar. I think it is but due to this claimant that the bill should be taken up at an early day and considered in the Senate; and I give notice of my intention to call it up at a very early day.

HENRY C. DE AHNA.

Mr. DAWES. I call up now the bill which I reported yesterday from the Committee on Finance, and ask for its present consideration. It will take but a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] has given notice several times that on this day, at the conclusion of the business of the morning hour, he would submit some remarks to the Senate. The Chair feels bound to recognize that Senator.

Mr. DAWES. I shall not interfere with the Senator from West Virginia. The Committee on Finance instructed me to ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment for the passage of this bill, as there are peculiar circumstances requiring final action at once. I do not think it will take a moment if the Senator from West Virginia will indulge me. I shall not interrupt the Senator if he objects to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. At the solicitation of several Senators I feel that I must give way; but if the bill should lead to any debate, of course the Senator from Massachusetts himself will withdraw it and allow me to proceed.

Mr. DAWES. I will.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1592) for the relief of Henry C. De Ahna, late collector of customs at Sitka, Alaska. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in the settlement of the accounts of Henry C. De Ahna, late collector of customs at Sitka, Alaska, to allow, in addition to the salary and fees to which he is entitled under existing law, the further sum of $3,500 in full compensation for all expenses incurred and losses sustained by him in traveling to and from Alaska and in obtaining and furnishing the Treasury Department with reports concerning the condition of public affairs in that Territory.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES CHESNUT.

Mr. BUTLER. My friend from West Virginia has consented to allow me to call up House bill No. 5503.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 5503) to remove the political disabilities of James Chesnut, of South Carolina.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, two-thirds of the Senate concurring therein.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his Secretaries, announced that the President had on the 13th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 88) for the relief of James W. Richard and J. S. Brown & Brothers, of Denver, Colorado;

An act (S. No. 347) to remove the political disabilities of Manning M. Kimmell, late of Cape Girardeau County, Missouri;

An act (S. No. 882) to authorize the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to audit and pay the claim of the State of Tennessee for keeping United States military prisoners;

An act (S. No. 992) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer, of Chambers County, Alabama; and

An act (S. No. 1244) for the relief of the legal representatives of George Williams, deceased.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DENNIS. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. WHYTE] is detained at home by sickness in his family.

ADVANCEMENT OF AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, I move to take up the concurrent resolution offered by me early in December, in relation to the advancement of agricultural interests.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, December 4, 1878:

Whereas agriculture is the foundation of nearly all our wealth and it is mainly through the exportation of its products that we are paying off our large indebtedness, foreign and domestic, and have the present large balance of trade in our favor; and

Whereas although about one-half of the people of this country are engaged in agricultural pursuits and all other interests are dependent upon this, our leading and most important interest, commercial and otherwise, yet but little has been done by the General Government to promote agriculture, while other less general and important interests have been largely aided: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the committees on agriculture of the respective Houses be, and they are hereby, instructed to consider generally the subject of agriculture, and report, by bill or otherwise, what can or ought to be done by the General Government to better advance, encourage, and foster agricultural interests, and that said committees shall have the power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, in inviting the attention of the Senate to this resolution and asking its passage I feel that there is no subject of more importance and more moment to the country, none around which so many interests cluster and in which so many center, as American agriculture.

It is a subject so broad, so national, so universal, so non-partisan, so non-sectional, so far-reaching in its effects and important in its results, that it should at once command the patient attention of all, and in its consideration party feeling and party passion should have no voice.

The country has been, and is, weighed down with a heavy national, State, municipal, and individual debt, held at home and abroad, the interest and principal of which must be paid; business has been, and is, depressed; commerce languishes; confidence is destroyed; almost numberless remedies and suggestions have been proposed to bring relief and restore prosperity, but, in the prolonged stagnation, most all have failed and are distrusted.

This resolution is not brought forward as a panacea for all our ills and the only safe road out of our troubles, but it is claimed that for what has been done in the past to bring relief, and for whatever of light and hope there is ahead of us, the country is mainly indebted to agriculture; and if anything can be done to stimulate and better promote this great national interest, the greatest of all, it will not only continue largely to aid in bringing relief and restore prosperity, but remain a lasting and substantial benefit to the country in the future.

IMPORTANCE OF AGRICULTURE.

It is impossible to measure, or even estimate, the importance of agriculture to a people. It is the foundation upon which civilization and society rest; the basis and source of the permanent wealth of a nation. No people in history have made substantial progress in civilization, the arts and sciences, and have remained long prosperous, if they neglected agriculture. It is the most universal of all arts, the parent of manufactures and commerce, and the basis of all other industries, and without which all others must decay and perish.

In all countries, its rudest beginnings have marked the first steps in the emancipation of the people from barbarism and their approach to civilization and organized society. This fact is fully established by annually appropriating and expending large sums and sending agents to induce the savage Indian to adopt farming instead of hunting for a living, and when successful much has been accomplished, and the Indian is on the high road to become a good and useful citizen.

Adam was the first agriculturist. We read in Genesis:

And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it.

In the earliest times the Egyptians were devoted to agricultural pursuits, and Egyptian civilization only took form and shape after her people learned to till the soil.

The Israelites were one of the greatest agricultural nations of antiquity: nearly the whole people were engaged in agriculture; it constituted the chief source of their wealth. Nearly every Israelite was a land-owner, and literally sat "under his own vine and fig tree." Noah was a husbandman. Abraham had flocks. Job, in addition to owning large herds and flocks, had five hundred yoke of oxen, with which he plowed. Isaac was a farmer, and Jacob tended flocks and herds. David was a farmer and also a shepherd.

The Greeks, though possessing a sterile soil, gave great attention to agriculture.

ROME AND AGRICULTURE.

In the early history of Rome the people were thoroughly devoted to agriculture, and were proud of it; it was their chief source of wealth. They were a nation of farmers, and it was during the period they paid the most attention to agriculture that they enjoyed the most substantial progress, prosperity, and success. The state allotted to each citizen a certain parcel of land, and he who was not content to own and till the land was deemed dangerous to the state and to society. One could not hold office unless he was a land-owner and a cultivator of the soil; and it is a remarkable fact that the decline of agriculture, more than anything else, marks the decay and dissolution of the Roman Empire. When her people neglected tilling the soil and tending their herds, and depended upon the neighboring provinces for supplies and food, her glory began to depart.

Cato, distinguished as a general, statesman, and orator, found time to write books upon farming. Cicero, the renowned and eloquent orator, prided himself upon his agricultural attainments. The agricultural literature of Rome was unsurpassed in its time, and is only inferior to that of a few nations to-day.

Cincinnatus was a farmer, and after having been chief ruler of his country and one of its great generals, returned to his plow. He was called from thence to save his country a second time, and, having accomplished his high purpose, he returned to it again.

In Spain, under the Saracens, followed by the Moors, agriculture reached a high state of perfection, which has not been surpassed in more modern times. The revenue from it alone amounted to $30,000,000 per annum more than the combined revenue of all the other monarchs of Europe at that time. During the dark ages, when the Goths, Vandals, and other barbarian conquerors overran nearly all Europe, agriculture was not only neglected and abandoned but it sunk into the lowest condition of contempt. It seemed as if civilization had taken its flight and barbarism was about to claim the world.

WHAT AGRICULTURE HAS ACCOMPLISHED.

About the fourteenth century agriculture revived and the improvement and elevation of the lower and middle classes began, and, with its advance, has gradually gone on all over the world.

Agriculture started England on her high road to prosperity and the commercial supremacy which she has maintained in the world for five hundred years.

Through agriculture a large part of Holland was reclaimed from the sea, and it is now the foundation of her great wealth and prosperity.

The people comprising the great German Empire, one of the most powerful of nations and respected all over the world, are largely devoted to agriculture and are greatly indebted to it for their wealth and power.

It has been the glory of France and the chief occupation of her people for centuries, and through it, though but a few years ago a conquered people and compelled to pay a war indemnity whose figures are staggering, but which was paid in less time than any other nation ever paid so large an amount, to-day her people are proud, rich, and prosperous.

It is agriculture that gives greatness to Russia and enables her to contend for supremacy in European affairs and carry on her great wars.

Belgium and Switzerland, though small, owe their prosperity and importance largely to agriculture.

Indeed, all history attests the fact that where a people have devoted themselves to agriculture they have been uniformly prosperous and progressive, while those nations and the people who have abandoned or even neglected it have declined.

The majority of all people, in all times and ages of the world, from the humblest to the highest, have engaged in agriculture. Presidents, emperors, kings, and nobles have not thought it a condescension to be farmers, but rather an honor and a credit. The greatest names in our history have been those who were practical farmers and devoted to agriculture. We have been from the beginning, and must remain, a nation of farmers.

WHAT WE OWE TO AMERICAN FARMERS.

From the time of the landing at Jamestown and Plymouth Rock, the American farmers have always constituted the advance guard and the largest part of that grand army of progress and liberty which in its triumphant march in the face of dangers, trials, privations, and the cruelty of the savage has gradually subdued forests, crossed rivers, and climbed mountains, until civilization, society, churches, schools, and happy homes have been established from ocean to ocean and from the lakes to the Gulf.

The American farmers have laid the foundation of an empire on this continent, destined, largely through their efforts, virtues, industry, courage, and devotion to free government, to surpass in substantial glory, grandeur, wealth, progress, and prosperity all the nations of this world and the achievements of all history.

Our liberties were conquered and our Constitution made mainly by farmers, and to them in any and every great crisis we must look for the safe-keeping and protection of both.

As a rule the agricultural classes have always been devoted to liberty, peace, and good order, and the friends of established society and the enemies of disorder, wrong, change, violence, and unjust revolution: they constitute the reserve forces of conservatism in all governments, particularly in ours.

The collection of large populations in commercial centers, by depleting the country, has a dangerous tendency. It is in the cities and these great centers that rings, strikes, frauds, trades unions, centralization, and consolidation are born, fostered, and best flourish, while in the agricultural districts the tendency is in the opposite direction.

EMINENT MEN AND AGRICULTURE.

Washington, called from his farm to command the armies of the Revolution, having gained our liberties and started our Government in its grand experiment, against the unanimous entreaties of his countrymen to remain in public life, returned to his farm at Mount Vernon and superintended it until the close of his exemplary and patriotic life, nearly the last act of which was to ride over and inspect his various fields and give orders concerning the same.

In a letter to Sir John Sinclair, Washington said:

> I know of no pursuit in which more real and important service can be rendered to any country than by improving its agriculture and its breed of useful animals.

And in his messages to Congress he more than once called attention to the great importance of agriculture.

General Jackson, in his fourth annual message to Congress, (December, 1832,) in speaking of agriculture, says:

> The wealth and strength of a country are its population, and the best part of that population are the cultivators of the soil. Independent farmers are everywhere the basis of society and the true friends of liberty.

Another great mind has said: "A virtuous and intelligent farmer has attained the highest estate of fallen man."

Mr. Jefferson, when not attending to his public duties, spent most of his time upon his estate at Monticello. He said that agriculture was the highest calling of man, the surest road and safeguard to a nation's prosperity and liberty.

Mr. Webster, perhaps the greatest constitutional lawyer this country ever produced, was fond of agricultural pursuits, and spent all of his leisure time at Marshfield, where his great mind found ample scope and occupation in attending to his farm and stock.

Mr. Clay, that great patriot of the West, who knew no North, South, East, or West, spent much of his time at Ashland, and while there devoted his great talent to farming; and when permitted to retire from public life he returned to his farm.

That able, pure, and great man, Silas Wright, when he retired from public life, went direct to his farm and gave his personal attention to its management; and the last work of his pen was to write an agricultural address, which he did not live to deliver. It is a proud distinction to agriculture in our country that it numbers among its advocates and followers such names as Washington, Jefferson, Adams, Madison, Jackson, Webster, Clay, and Wright.

Napoleon the First said that agriculture was the body and soul of the empire; and, in the height of his glory, he gave the subject much attention and encouragement, and established in France a department of agriculture.

Dr. Johnson remarks that agriculture not only gives riches to a nation, but the only riches she can call her own.

Prince Albert, a model farmer, said that agriculture was the foundation of the social state.

Gibbon says that agriculture is the foundation of manufactures, since the productions of nature are the materials of art.

THE UNITED STATES AND AGRICULTURE.

The following table presents the number of persons engaged in the different occupations in the United States at the last enumerations:

Population.	1870 (census.)		1878.
	Number.	Per cent.	Number.	Per cent.
Total over 10 years	28,228,945	.....	34,000,000	.....
Males in all occupations	12,505,923	.....	15,000,000	.....
Agriculture	5,922,471	47.35	7,600,000	50.66
Manufacturing and mining	2,707,421	21.65	2,900,000	19.33
Professional and personal	2,684,793	21.47	3,000,000	20.00
Trade, commerce, and transportation	1,191,238	9.52	1,500,000	10.00

The census of 1870 gives an aggregate value of all personal and real property for that year of $29,822,535,140.

The agricultural interest being valued at 38 per cent. of all others combined the value of farms and property is $11,124,959,037.

Value of farms, 1870	$9,262,803,861
Value of farm animals, 1870	1,525,276,747
Value of farm implements, 1870	336,879,429

In the United States about half or twenty-three millions of the people are engaged in agriculture. It is the fundamental business of the country, the leading commercial interest, and the most important home industry. We are a nation of farmers, and because of the vast area of our soil and its great fertility we must remain so. Our agricultural products not only support our people, but pay for what we buy abroad; they furnish our greatest source of revenue, and to them we are indebted for the balance of trade now being largely in our favor, and that our bonds and other indebtedness held abroad are so rapidly coming home. Ordinarily upon the results of our crops hinge our prosperity for a given year or period. If the crops are good, business is good; if short, business is dull.

The crops exert a controlling influence upon the moneyed operations of the people at home and abroad. The bankers, manufacturers, and merchants, in fact all classes of business men, watch if possible with more interest and concern the growth and gathering of the crops than the farmer who sows and reaps them. Mr. Jefferson declared that one-half of our old war debt was paid through the products of agriculture, and it is through them mainly that our new war and other debts have been and must be paid. If the farmers for a given year should only raise enough for their own support the consequences to the other classes would be almost ruinous; and if the crops should absolutely fail for a year the ruin and the starvation that would follow would be beyond description.

We have rich gold and silver mines, inexhaustible iron, coal, copper, and lead mines, great salt and petroleum wells, large forests of timber; but none of these, nor all combined, are equal to agriculture. Not only are the people of the United States interested in American agriculture and dependent upon it for support, for revenue, and for prosperity, but the whole world, because America is the granary of the world.

In the United States a more general and better interest is being awakened in agriculture; its importance is fast becoming better understood and appreciated; the people are beginning to learn and understand that mainly to agriculture, now and in the great future, we must look for our prosperity as a nation. It is not so much discredited and abandoned for the overcrowded professions and cities, for mercantile pursuits, and for clerkships now as in times past.

The following figures, taken from official sources, will serve to show what agriculture has done and is doing for the country. An official statement of the Treasury Department, dated January 1, 1879, shows that—

The imports for the twelve months ending November 30, 1877, were	$482,292,984
And for the twelve months ending November 30, 1878, were	430,661,998
Decrease of imports	51,630,986
The exports for the twelve months ending November 30, 1878, were	739,971,739
And for the twelve months ending November 30, 1877, were	623,016,613
Increase of exports	116,955,126
The exports for the twelve months ending November 30, 1878	739,971,739
The imports for the same period	430,661,998
Exports over imports	309,309,741

This is a good showing in round numbers during 1878. We bought $5,000,000 less and sold $116,000,000 more than we did in 1877, and we sold $309,000,000 more than we bought. This is principally owing to agriculture.

The following table, taken from the official report of the Bureau of Statistics, dated September, 1878, speaks well for agriculture:

This statement shows that in 1878 our agricultural products, including forest, were about 82 per cent., and since 1850 they have averaged about 74 per cent. of our total exports.

The annual production and value of cereals for the ten years ending 1877 are given in the following table from official sources:

Per cent. of agricultural products to total domestic exports	77.00	76.72	72.59	77.05

For the year 1878 our exports from agriculture alone reached the enormous sum of $536,038,951

While our entire exports from all other sources, including agriculture, for 1878, amount to 695,749,930

Total exports, less agriculture 159,710,979

This shows that agriculture furnished full three-fourths of our entire exports, and amounted to more in dollars than our imports.

These statements establish the fact that as in the past we have mainly depended upon agriculture, so in the future we must look to it for our support and ability to pay for what we purchase abroad, as also the payment of our foreign debt and interest.

COTTON.

The soil of some of our States is so well adapted to the growing of cotton that we are the chief producer of the world, and must remain so. It constitutes the largest factor in our exports, bringing us since 1865 an average of more than $200,000,000 per annum, or more than two and a half billions for the thirteen years—which is more than our national debt. Without cotton our foreign trade would have been largely against us. There are good reasons to believe the production will increase from year to year. This large amount is part of the aid and contribution the Southern States bring to us in restoring prosperity to the whole country.

BREADSTUFFS, INCLUDING ALL CEREALS, constitute the next largest item in our exports, yielding last year $181,777,841, and an average since 1865 of near $100,000,000 per annum.

ANIMAL PRODUCTS, INCLUDING CATTLE AND HOGS, rank next in exports, and amounted last year to $133,232,575, an average for the last decade of about $80,000,000 per annum. For this and breadstuffs we are chiefly indebted to the West.

BUTTER AND CHEESE.

This is an important farming and agricultural interest which has not hitherto attracted the attention it deserves, and one that is fast growing in our country. It is estimated that last year the total production of cheese was 350,000,000 pounds, and of butter 1,500,000,000 pounds; estimated value of both being about $350,000,000. This is the contribution of the whole country, and is the leading agricultural interest next to corn, being only one-fourth less in value, one-third more than cotton, and one-seventh more than the hay crop. The exports for 1878 were: cheese, $14,103,529; butter, $3,931,822.

The number of cows in the United States is estimated at about 12,500,000—over six times the number in Great Britain, and twice the number in France.

These tables speak volumes for agriculture and show a great increase in the last few years.

POPULATION.

France, with an area of 201,000 square miles, has a population of about 36,000,000, or 182 persons to the square mile. At the last census Texas, with an area of 274,000 square miles, had a population of less than 1,000,000, or about 4 people to the square mile, while her soil and climate is equal, if not better, than that of France or any other country.

Belgium, with an area of 11,373 square miles, has a population of 5,336,634, or about 469 people to the square mile, while we have a dozen States with a larger area, equally fertile soil and better climate, with less than 20 people to the square mile.

Germany, with an area of 212,091 square miles, has a population of 42,727,360, or about 200 persons to the squate mile.

Great Britain and islands, with a population of 31,628,338, has an area of 121,230 square miles, or about 268 persons to the square mile.

The United States, with an area of 3,603,884 square miles, has a population of about 45,000,000, or 13 persons to the square mile, and if we take the States only and exclude the Territories the population is 22 persons to the square mile.

We have more than 2,000,000,000 acres of land, with a soil and climate unsurpassed and adapted to the production of almost everything necessary to the wants and comfort of mankind, three-fourths of which can be used for agricultural purposes, and much of it, indeed more than one-half, can be purchased for less than the rental value per acre for a single year of the agricultural lands of England, France, Germany, and Belgium.

These figures show that we have ample territory with agricultural facilities to support a population of many hundred millions, and then not be so densely populated as the countries above named.

In substantial prosperity and progress, in all that makes a nation great, we must soon take the lead of all other countries; and New York, supported by our vast agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial resources, at no distant day ought to and will be the financial and commercial center of the world as London is to-day.

This prospect should stimulate the encouragement of agriculture and commerce, which must contribute so largely to this result. It must, however, be admitted that, instead of doing so, the tendency and effect of our national legislation has been to encourage other industries and the building up of towns and cities at the expense of the soil, the mine, and commerce.

Several of the countries of Europe are now overcrowded with people, and it is a question whether or not they can long support the increasing population. There is trouble to-day in England and Germany from this source.

Lord Derby, in a recent address made at Liverpool on the subject of the present depression in England, stated in substance, "after much reflection," that England could not afford to pay large sums for food to America and other countries and compete with them in manufactures, and advised as a remedy wholesale emigration to America and Australia.

While we do not want the paupers from other countries, yet we have ample farming lands and room for all persons devoted to honest industry.

TARIFF AND OTHER LEGISLATION AGAINST THE FARMER.

The duty on articles used by farmers averages about 42½ per cent.

	Per cent.
On iron and steel it is from	35 to 50
Leather	25
China and earthen ware	40 to 50
Hosiery	35 to 60
Hats, bonnets, &c	40
Carpets	50 to 68
Salt	60
Ready-made clothing	50 to 60

The farmer pays the above duties and many more, and the eastern or manufacturing States receive the greater part of the benefit.

Then, again, most all the internal revenue comes from the tax on two items of agricultural products, one produced directly and the other indirectly from the soil.

The revenue from the tax on tobacco in 1878 was $40,091,754.67; spirits and liquors, $60,357,867.58—total, $110,459,622.25; and this comes almost entirely from the Southern and Western States.

In 1877 Virginia paid internal-revenue tax to the amount of $7,932,220, which is more than twice as much as all the New England States combined paid, and West Virginia paid $461,030.50, which is more than the States of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont together paid.

The following table shows the receipts from tobacco and spirits in the States named for the year 1878:

States.	Spirits.	Tobacco.	Aggregate receipts.
Connecticut	$270,328 89	$156,348 63	$580,335 59
Illinois	16,072,539 33	2,829,805 58	19,668,791 32
Kentucky	4,866,480 32	1,746,118 21	6,880,614 15
Maine	15,217 42	46,356 84	70,695 78
Massachusetts	1,055,739 29	693,925 63	2,424,363 77
New Hampshire	65,144 06	30,572 51	228,188 11
Ohio	10,127,172 80	3,476,501 63	14,770,506 37
Rhode Island	39,072 21	63,254 00	246,759 65
Vermont	11,752 32	23,348 14	44,339 49
Virginia	302,580 21	6,145,442 85	6,501,730 29

This tax is mainly paid by agricultural States, as the above table shows, and falls directly or indirectly on the farmer, while manufactures and other industries of the non-agricultural States are aided by protection at the expense of the former.

So in one way or another the burdens of taxation fall heaviest on the farmer and agricultural interests, against which there should be some relief.

AID RENDERED BY DIFFERENT GOVERNMENTS TO AGRICULTURE.

From reliable sources we learn there was expended for the year 1877 by some of the governments of Europe in aid of agriculture the following sums:

Austria and Hungary	£1,099,025 or	$5,495,125
France, for agriculture and commerce	110,672,050 francs or	$20,534,410
Prussia	10,459,343 marks or	$2,612,340
Italy, for agriculture and commerce	10,863,981 livres or	$2,715,995
Russia, for agriculture and public lands	18,434,912 rubles or	$14,826,184
Great Britain	£159,118 or	$795,590
Sweden		$651,737
United States		$174,686

The following appropriations for the years named will be sufficient to illustrate the difference in the amounts appropriated for the various departments of the General Government:

Departments.	1877.	1878.	1879.
Department of State	$1,377,428 43	$1,353,807 50	$7,134,325 64
Treasury Department	163,015,647 68	159,222,392 61	167,122,213 75
War Department	39,251,271 81	4,245,628 00	68,263,792 48
Navy Department	13,115,176 55	13,745,422 90	20,684,492 83
Interior Department	37,673,054 12	36,674,573 32	38,245,551 74
Post-Office Department	6,422,283 49	3,469,045 00	7,295,389 98
Department of Justice	3,364,343 31	3,424,950 00	3,918,913 94
Department of Agriculture	174,686 96	188,640 00	204,900 00

These figures show how liberally the prosperous and progressive European governments aid and encourage agriculture and how little we do for this great interest. Russia, our great and principal agricultural rival, spends in support of agriculture and in respect of her public lands more than seventy times as much as the United States, and the little Kingdom of Sweden more than three times as much as this great nation.

We have what is called a Department of Agriculture, with a commissioner at its head, whose salary is $3,000 per annum, and the next highest salary is $1,900, while there are a large number of employés in other Departments whose chiefs of divisions or heads of bureaus receive from $3,000 to $6,000 salary per annum. The salaries of the Agricultural Department are either too low or the others are too high.

In the Senate the Committee on Agriculture is composed of five, while most of the other committees have from seven to nine members. The Committee on Commerce has nine and on Railroads eleven members. Why should not the Committee on Agriculture be made equal to any committee of the Senate? The slender aid we render in the way of appropriations and the attention given to agriculture in Congress indicate that we hold it inferior in importance to industries of much less magnitude and moment. The Commissioner of Agriculture within the last few years has done well, considering the limited means at his command, and deserves credit. Considering the vast importance of agriculture to the country, the number of people engaged in it, the interests dependent upon and affected by it, it seems to me that it deserves and demands at our hands more attention and substantial aid. There is nothing sectional or political about agriculture, and all parts of the country are interested in it.

AGRICULTURAL IMPORTS.

A large amount of agricultural products are imported which might and ought to be grown within our own borders.

The following table from the Bureau of Statistics shows the amount and value of sugar and molasses imported from 1869 to 1878:

Statement of imports into the United States of sugar, melada, and molasses during the years 1869 to 1878, inclusive.

For the year 1878 the value of these imports was about $77,000,000, and for the nine years named we paid for sugar and molasses the enormous sum of about $600,000,000.

Nearly if not all of this vast sum paid to foreign countries might have been saved had the overflowed and swamp lands on the Mississippi and other rivers (a large portion of which is especially adapted to the growth of sugar-cane) been reclaimed and the overflow provided against and prevented.

If the half of $77,000,000 we pay in a single year for sugar and molasses should be expended in reclaiming the swamp lands and preventing the usual overflows of the Mississippi and other rivers it would not only save to the country annually what we pay out for these articles, but restore from ten to fifteen million acres of rich, arable, and most productive farming lands to this and other agricultural uses, now abandoned and utterly useless. How long would France, England, Germany, Russia, or Holland suffer such a vast body of fertile soil to lie idle and go to waste while paying for what might be produced upon it annually nearly a hundred millions of dollars? The power of the General Government to levee the Mississippi River I believe is admitted. This being the case, is not the duty of Congress from an economical stand-point clear in the premises?

The following table shows many other agricultural products imported by our people, many, if not all, of which might be produced at home and save to the United States and its people more than a hundred million dollars per annum:

* From Hawaiian Islands.

From the above official table it will be seen that the home value of articles imported in 1878 was..... $156,151,723 70
Value of duty added in 1878 was..... 210,918,125 46

This is a large amount of money paid for agricultural products that ought to be produced in our own country. We find by this table we pay foreign countries for—

Sugar and molasses, annually, nearly	$90,000,000
Tobacco and cigars, annually, nearly	6,000,000
Wine, annually, nearly	4,000,000
Wool, annually, nearly	7,000,000
Barley, annually, nearly	4,000,000
Eggs, annually, nearly	726,000

Eggs come in free of duty, and the amount paid is so large for so small an article that the following official table is given, which shows quantity, amount paid, and where from:

Quantity and value of eggs imported into the United States during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1878.

Countries.	Quantity.	Value.
	Dozens.
China	87,800	$6,022
Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island	1,096,963	126,574

Hong-Kong	1,695	100
Total	6,053,649	726,037

Excluding silk and tea, the successful production of which is yet doubtful, and we pay annually more than one hundred millions for products that might be grown in our own country.

In the face of these figures and facts argument is not needed to show that agriculture is of the first and highest importance to our people and should be properly aided and encouraged.

A nation, like a corporation or individual that lives beyond his income, must in time become poor and in debt. After the war, between 1865 and the panic in September, 1873, we had what is usually called good times, when in fact as a nation we were paying to foreign countries much more than we received from them; that is, our imports were more than our exports, as the following official table will show:

NET IMPORTS AND DOMESTIC EXPORTS OF MERCHANDISE, COIN, AND BULLION.

1878	446,039,908	707,738,783		261,698,875

*Net imports mean total imports less imported merchandise, coin, and bullion afterward exported to foreign countries. (specie values.)

The above statement clearly shows we paid, between 1860 and 1873, $439,087,737 more for imports than we received for exports.

In 1873 trade reversed, and has been largely in our favor up to this time. During the five fiscal years between 1873 and 1878 we exported or sold $659,072,791 more than we imported or bought. This is a good sign, and shows we are winding on and not off; and if we continue to export largely more than we import, it is only a question of time, which I believe is not distant, when we will be a prosperous and happy people.

Europe, in addition to paying us the large balance of trade now in our favor, according to a recent statement of David A. Wells, expends an average annually of $1,500,000,000 for war and the support of standing armies, while since the formation of our Government our average expenses annually for these purposes have been about $45,000,000.

In most of the governments of Europe all young men between the ages of twenty and twenty-seven are obliged to serve in the standing armies, thereby taking seven years of each man's life from useful industries.

If we had no other advantage than these named, we would in time grow rich and Europe poor.

WEST VIRGINIA.

And now, Mr. President, I trust I will be pardoned for turning aside and briefly referring to the State which I have the honor in part to represent, whose mineral and agricultural resources are so great and so varied. They are largely undeveloped as yet, the greater part of them lying dormant; but when the treasures of this mountain State are unearthed, as they must in time be, they will astonish the world. In minerals, such as coal, iron, and salt, West Virginia stands unrivaled, with the one exception, Pennsylvania. In the production of oil, which has become one of our largest industries and one of our most productive sources of national revenue, West Virginia and Pennsylvania are entitled to all the credit.

West Virginia has also agricultural and other resources of which the general traveler, in passing through the State over our principal thoroughfares, has but an imperfect idea. The Baltimore and Ohio and Chesapeake and Ohio, the principal railroads which pass through the State in their search for the lightest grades follow closely the streams in their deeply sunken channels cut through the mountain gorges, and the stranger, seeing nothing, comparatively speaking, but wild, rugged, and picturesque scenery, would naturally have erroneous impressions as to soil, topography, and resources.

SOIL.

Professor Maury, in his work on West Virginia, says that the large proportion of the State is fortunate in having a loam soil, composed of clay and sand mixed in about equal proportions. It may be said to be the characteristic soil of the State.

The "bottom lands" along most of the rivers are widely celebrated for their productiveness. The mountain and hill sides and even the tops are unsurpassed for grazing. Some of the finest and largest cattle sold in the eastern markets are from West Virginia.

Indeed, the State presents great advantages to the successful prosecution of farming and other industries. We are progressing intellectually and morally. There is no State in the Union that has made greater advances in schools within the last decade. Our taxes are about as low as any State in the Union.

COAL.

The coal-fields of West Virginia are, beyond question, the most remarkable in the world. It is in this State that the veins of bituminous coal exhibit their maximum thickness, having in the Kanawha Valley a combined thickness of fifty feet. This State is the only place in this country where cannel coal is found in good quality and paying quantities; and it is said to be fully equal to the best English or Nova Scotia. The splint coal of the Kanawha Valley is one of the best non-coking coals for smelting iron that can be found anywhere. Another advantage our coal possesses is that it is nearest to the seaboard, and consequently the rates of transportation are, or ought to be, greatly in our favor. The excellent gas and steam qualities of our bituminous coal are known all over the country.

The anthracite coal is confined to an area of about 470 square miles in Pennsylvania, where it alone is found in this country. The production in 1877 amounted to..... 21,323,000 tons.
The coal area of West Virginia comprises near 16,000 square miles, with a production in 1877 of..... 1,000,000 tons.
While the whole of Great Britain has but 11,900 square miles, with a production in 1877 of..... 134,179,968 tons.
Germany 1,770 square miles, producing in 1877..... 48,337,950 tons.
France 2,086 square miles, producing in 1877..... 16,763,779 tons.

A report made by the engineer department of the United States to the Secretary of War (Ex. Doc. 110, third session, Forty-first Congress, page 49) makes the following reference to West Virginia coals:

It is well known to geological men that the veins of bituminous coal which pervade the entire western slope of the Appalachian chain of mountains have their maximum aggregate thickness in the Kanawha Valley. From a late authentic work on the subject of Kanawha coals the following extract is made:

"The coal fields of the Kanawha region are superior to those of Great Britain or Pennsylvania. They are regarded by eminent gentlemen as the finest deposit of coal in the world. The quality of Kanawha cannel is equal to the best English; its bituminous is equal to the best found in Pennsylvania, and Kanawha splint, for smelting iron, is unsurpassed. The veins lie nearly horizontal, and vary from three feet to fifteen feet in thickness; and the aggregate thickness of the various seams in some localities amounts to forty and fifty feet of solid coal."

In the Piedmont or North Branch region the coal is fully equal to that in Kanawha Valley, and some of the veins now being worked are from fifteen to twenty feet thick of pure coal.

SALT AND NAILS.

The salt of the Kanawha and Ohio Valleys has the great advantage of being manufactured very cheaply; and it is a most superior article, as is attested by the preference given it in every market where it has been introduced. I doubt if there is another place in this whole country where salt can be made as cheaply as in the Kanawha and Ohio Valleys. There are over twenty salt-furnaces in the State, with an annual capacity of six million bushels.

West Virginia produces about one million kegs of nails annually, or about one-sixth of the whole amount of cut nails made in the world.

PETROLEUM.

Among the important productions of our State is petroleum. In the past three years, 1876, 1877, and 1878, there were produced in the oil regions of West Virginia and Pennsylvania 34,384,275 barrels or 1,444,139,550 gallons of petroleum, and of this amount there were exported 891,236,235 gallons of the value of $141,270,198, or an average of about $50,000,000 per annum. The production of petroleum in 1860 was but 10,542,000 gallons, while in 1878 it amounted to 619,007,004 gallons. The exportation of petroleum began in 1862, and in 1878 it amounted to near 66 per cent. of the entire production, being 407,482,175 gallons. It now ranks as the fifth article of export from this country.

TIMBER AND IRON.

The timber of our State is probably as good in quality and large in amount as that of any State in the Union. Almost every description of timber is found in the State, some of the most important varieties in great abundance.

The iron ore of West Virginia is abundant and varied. There are a number of iron-furnaces and rolling-mills in the State, and they all find a ready sale for their productions, which are of the best quality.

AGRICULTURE.

Though our State has such immense mineral resources, yet a large proportion of her population is engaged in agriculture. Until of late years, although the soil is rich and gives generous returns, our people have paid but little attention to the raising of agricultural products for exportation. They were content to produce sufficient for home consumption. But now they are becoming more and more interested in the pursuit of agriculture and the development of the great resources of the State. This is evidenced by the interest taken by the people in the different county fairs, and the number of granges in the State. It was at first feared that the Patrons of Husbandry would drift into politics and lose their usefulness, but such is not the case. They are doing a good work in West Virginia. No State has a greater or better variety of soil, and with increased attention given to agriculture, with our climate and proximity to the great markets, it may be predicted that in the near future West Virginia will take high rank as an agricultural as well as a mineral State.

AID TO AGRICULTURE.

The General Government has from time to time found warrant in the Constitution to aid directly and indirectly other industries of minor importance. Then why not seriously take in hand the great underlying and fundamental interest upon which all others depend, and do what may be properly done to promote and encourage it? All other interests and industries in comparison are subordinate and insignificant.

The extremities should not be nursed and nourished and the body and heart remain abandoned and neglected.

There is a feeling in the minds of the people that there is too much political agitation and contention in Congress and out of it; that too much effort is made to gain and maintain party supremacy while weighter matters and the things that make for peace and tend to promote prosperity are neglected.

The country and the business interests want quiet and repose. Progress, success, and prosperity such as never blessed another nation or people are within our grasp; our manufacturing, commercial, and agricultural supremacy in the world is no longer doubtful, but certain and assured if only proper effort is made.

Just to what extent and in what manner and by what methods the great agricultural interests of our entire country may be best promoted it will be the duty upon the adoption of this resolution of the Senate and House Committees on Agriculture to determine, and I have no doubt they will bring to the subject that careful and thoughtful consideration which it so justly merits.

France has very recently appointed through her department of agriculture a commission of able and distinguished persons to examine into the subject of agriculture and to report what should be done to advance and encourage it.

In urging the attention of Congress to agriculture I do not wish to detract from the importance of mining, manufacturing, and commerce. The latter especially ought to be considered by Congress. Between 1850 and 1860 American bottoms or vessels carried fully 75 per cent. of our commerce; now only about 25 per cent. This ought not to be, and a remedy is needed.

CONCLUSION.

Heretofore much attention and encouragement has been given by Congress and the departments of the Government to banks, railroads, tariff, &c., and but little to agriculture, which is the great interest upon which all depends. It is to be hoped there will be a change for the better and that the farming interests will receive more attention and encouragement.

President Hayes said, in his last message to Congress:

The great extent of our country, with its diversity of soil and climate, enables us to produce within our own borders, and by our own labor, not only the necessaries but most of the luxuries that are consumed in civilized countries. Yet, notwithstanding our advantages of soil, climate, and intercommunication, it appears from the statistical statements in the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, that we import annually from foreign lands many millions of dollars' worth of agricultural products which could be raised in our own country.

Mr. President, the world has had many great and able men in state and in war, among them, Alexander, Cæsar, Napoleon, La Fayette, Wellington, Cicero, Burke, Pitt, Franklin, Hamilton, Jefferson, and Lincoln; not one of these was, nor has the world yet produced, the equal of our great and pure Washington, who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

In his eighth message to Congress he said:

It is not to be doubted that with reference either to individual or national welfare, agriculture is of primary importance. In proportion as nations advance in population and other circumstances of maturity this truth becomes more apparent, and renders the cultivation of the soil more and more an object of public patronage. Institutions for promoting it grow up, supported by the public purse; and to what object can it be dedicated with greater propriety?

Here we have in the early days of our Government, when most of the makers of the Constitution were yet alive, from Washington, who did more to give us our liberties and the Constitution we now enjoy than any other man, a direct recognition of the necessity and advantages of and the power and duty of Congress to encourage and foster agriculture.

Mr. President, I ask the passage of this concurrent resolution, and trust it may pass unanimously, as I think it ought to.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, I do not wish to retard the adoption of the resolution introduced by my colleague of the Committee on Agriculture, but I desire myself to speak briefly to this resolution, and I ask, therefore, that it may lie over for a time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As a matter of course, when the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture requests a postponement, I cannot refuse; but I will say to my friend, who is chairman of the committee of which I am a member, that I hope that at as early a day as practicable, or as may be convenient for him, he will call the resolution up, because if we are to have action upon it during this Congress, it ought to go to the House soon.

Mr. PADDOCK. I feel the same interest in the adoption of the resolution that my colleague on the committee does. Therefore I shall at the earliest practicable day submit the few remarks that I may have occasion to submit.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over by common consent.

MISSOURI JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. THURMAN. I now ask for the consideration of the bill of which I gave notice yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio, in accordance with the notice given by him yesterday, asks the Senate to consider at this time the bill (H. R. No. 5067) to divide the western district of Missouri into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

An amendment was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu to insert the following:

The western district of Missouri is hereby divided into two divisions, which shall be known as the eastern and western divisions of the western district of Missouri. The western division shall include the counties of Andrew, Atchison, Barton, Bates, Buchanan, Caldwell, Carroll, Cass, Chariton, Clay, Clinton, Daviess, De Kalb, Gentry, Grundy, Harrison, Holt, Jackson, Jasper, La Fayette, Linn, Livingston, Mercer, Nodaway, Platte, Putnam, Ray, Saline, Sullivan, Vernon, and Worth; and a term of the district court and circuit court of the United States for said district shall be held therein at the city of Kansas on the third Monday in May and the third Monday in October of each year. The remaining counties embraced in said district shall constitute the eastern division thereof, and terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States for said district shall be held therein at the times and place now prescribed by law.

SEC. 2. All offenses hereafter committed in either of said divisions shall be cognizable and indictable within the division where committed; and all grand and petit jurors summoned for service in each division shall be inhabitants thereof. And all offenses heretofore committed within said district shall be prosecuted and tried as if this act had not passed.

SEC. 3. All civil suits not of a local character which shall be hereafter brought in the district or circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Missouri in either of said divisions, against a single defendant, or where all the defendants reside in the same division of said district, shall be brought in the division in which the defendant or defendants reside; but if there are two or more defendants residing in different divisions, such suit may be brought in either division, and all mesne and final process subject to the provisions of this act, issued in either of said divisions, may be served and executed in either or both of the divisions.

SEC. 4. The clerks of the circuit and district courts for said district shall each appoint a deputy clerk at the place where their respective courts are required to be held in the division of the district in which such clerk shall not himself reside, each of whom shall, in the absence of the clerk, exercise all the powers and perform all the duties of clerk within the division for which he shall be appointed: Provided, That the appointment of such deputies shall be approved by the court for which they shall be respectively appointed, and may be annulled by such court at its pleasure. And the clerk shall be responsible for the official acts and neglects of all such deputies.

SEC. 5. All civil suits and proceedings now pending in the circuit or district court of said western district of Missouri, and which would, if instituted after the passage of this act, be required to be brought in the western division of said district, may be transferred, by consent of all the parties, to said western division of said district, and there disposed of in the same manner and with like effect as if the same had been there instituted; and all process, writs, and recognizances relating to such suits and proceedings so transferred shall be considered as belonging to the term of the court in the western division of said district, in the same manner and with like effect as if they had been issued or taken in reference thereto originally.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M.

ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 17th of June, 1878, certain reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture on sheep husbandry; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of June 3, 1878, a copy of the correspondence between the Government of the United States and that of Her Britanic Majesty in regard to inviting other maritime powers to accede to the three rules of neutrality laid down in article 6 of the treaty of May 8, 1871; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of February 6, 1877, a narrative of the second expedition to the Arctic regions by the late Captain C. F. Hall, during the years 1864 to 1869; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of its unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 360) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. MORGAN, to strike out lines 30 to 35, inclusive, of the second section, in the following words:

And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff or the defense of the defendant was vexatious and malicious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the defeated party such sum, by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit, as it shall deem just and reasonable.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff or the defense of the defendant was vexatious or malicious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the party guilty of such vexatious or malicious conduct, or of such infringement, such sum by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit as it shall deem just and reasonable.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, the section of the bill that I suppose to be prominently in view of the Senate now is the second section, which I regard as the most important section of a very important bill. It is evident from the course of the debate that the bill itself has received long and careful consideration from the Committee on Patents, who have been assisted in their own reflections by arguments had before them from persons qualified to represent all the various interests which are involved in legislation of this character. In consequence of the carefulness of the consideration which this bill has received from the hands of its framers, it is rather an ungracious task to enter upon a work of criticism; and yet, as every Senator must vote in accordance with the results of his own reflections upon the subject, I feel it due to myself at least, and to such Senators as may choose to listen, to submit some objections which it seems to me are worth consideration in reference to this section of the bill. It may not be my good fortune to say anything which has not already been considered by the committee, and to which the advocates of the bill may not be ready at any time to furnish satisfactory answers; but as I have not yet heard any such I am compelled to make the objections which seem to me to avail.

The first criticism I have to make in reference to this section is a verbal one and easily obviated if there be anything substantial in it. The first sentence of the second section applies to pending suits, and prescribes that in such in which no final verdict has yet been rendered, or in which no decree for an account or settlement of damages has yet been pronounced, the measure of the plaintiff's recovery shall be the same, whether the suit be at law or in equity. The remainder of the section, as I suppose and assume, was intended to prescribe a rule of damages for future suits and actions; and yet the language of the remainder of the section does not so express the intention, and it might not be considered any extraordinary refinement of interpretation which should restrict and confine all the clauses of that section to pending suits, leaving the rule of damages as it now exists to be applied to all future actions and suits.

It is true that in the second sentence it is provided that if a license fee has already been established by a reasonable number of transactions applicable to the case at bar, such license fee or a proportion thereof according to the extent and duration of the infringement proved shall be the measure of the plaintiff's recovery in all cases, which would seem perhaps to be large enough to include possible as well as actual cases; and yet there would be nothing at all unreasonable in restricting that language to the cases mentioned in the first clause of the second section. It says:

In all suits for the infringement of a patent, in which, at the date of the passage of this act, no final verdict has been rendered, or no decree for an account or assessment of damages has been pronounced, the measure of the plaintiff's recovery shall be the same, both in law and in equity.

Mr. HOAR. That seems to me to include all future verdicts and all future decrees, whether in pending suits or in suits hereafter to be brought.

Mr. MATTHEWS. It may possibly mean that; and yet that is not the obvious meaning of it; and if we are legislating, certainly the matter ought to be put beyond any reasonable doubt; indeed it ought to be put beyond any doubt.

But the next objection I have to this section, Mr. President, is of more consequence. After providing that in actions at law or in suit in equity, if such be the application of the language, a license fee predicated upon an established and reasonable number of transactions shall be the measure and limit of the plaintiff's recovery, an exception is made, and that exception applies to cases both at law and in equity. The exception covers those "cases where the defendant has made an actual profit from making for sale or selling the thing patented or the product thereof," and prescribes that in such excepted cases, where the defendant has made such an actual profit from the making for sale or the actual sale of the thing patented, "the proportion of the actual profit of such making for sale or selling due to said infringement shall be determined," and that "that proportion," as and when determined of such actual profit "shall be the measure of the plaintiff's recovery." And now, in order, in actions at law, to provide a mode for ascertaining such profit and such proportion of the profits as may be due to the use of the infringement, it is provided that "the court may appoint an auditor to ascertain the same, and his report shall be prima facie evidence; but if such proportion shall not be equal to the amount of a license fee established or to be determined in the manner hereinafter provided, the plaintiff shall be entitled to recover such amount or so much thereof as shall be in excess of the profits so awarded."

Now, it is to be remembered that it is an attempt to provide the mode for ascertaining the damages to be assessed and for which judgment is to be rendered in an action at law to recover damages for the infringement of a patent. I inquire of the committee by what authority they withdraw from the consideration of the jury empaneled to try such a case the question of the amount of the recovery and seek to interpolate into that proceeding a proceeding at common law, the report of an auditor to ascertain the damages for which the verdict should be rendered, which it is declared in the same terms is not to be conclusive but only prima facie evidence of the amount to be rendered as the judgment, and to whose discretion is that matter subsequently to be submitted? That of the court? Or is the jury to pass with the aid of this report from an auditor upon the question of the damages? And if so, at what period in the history of the suit, and when and how is it to be determined that the case is one for the interposition of an auditor to ascertain these facts? At what stage of the trial, on whose motion, by what suggestion, upon what testimony? Because it is not and cannot be known in advance by either court or jury, when the case is about to be submitted to the jury, when the jury is sworn to try the issues of fact involved upon the pleadings, when the testimony is taken, whether the case is one of the excepted cases in reference to which an auditor shall be appointed, or whether it is a case in reference to which the statutory rule measuring the damages is to be applied. Is the court to interrupt the course of procedure on the discovery upon evidence of the fact which constitutes the contingency for the appointment of the auditor and thereupon appoint the auditor and dismiss the jury, or what is to become of the case?

I doubt, Mr. President, very seriously whether these provisions are either practicable or constitutional. The Constitution of the United States expressly provides, in the seventh article of amendments, that—

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

Is this fact to be passed upon by the jury and then re-examined upon the report of an auditor by the court, or is the cause to be arrested prior to the verdict by the judge, the jury dismissed, and the cause submitted without a jury upon the question of damages, and without the consent of the parties?

It seems to me that these provisions are lacking at least in that definiteness of detail which if prescribed might possibly extricate the whole section from the category in which I think it now stands, both as being impracticable of execution, or if practicable then in violation of a fundamental principle of the Constitution.

But I object further, Mr. President, to the entire section as it stands, to its substance, to its merits, as undertaking to originate and prescribe a statutory rule for the measurement of damages recoverable at law or in equity for the infringement of patents. By the terms of the Constitution, under which the jurisdiction of Congress to legislate at all upon this subject vests, it is provided that—

The Congress shall have power * * * to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

The very means by which Congress is to exert its authority as conferred in this section is provided by the Constitution itself. It is a recognition perhaps of the natural right of property in ideas when embodied in useful writings and inventions; but whether it be the creation merely of law or a declaration by law of that which nature has previously declared and established, Congress is required in its legislation to do one thing in all that it does; in all that it attempts it has one object in view; and that is to secure for a limited time to authors and inventors an exclusive right. An exclusive right is a right which excludes that of all others. It is a monopoly. It is a declaration of a title to private property vested in the originator and owner and sanctioned by this constitutional prescription. Congress in pursuance of that power has legislated and undertakes to secure to inventors and to authors for the times named in the various statutes on that subject the exclusive right of property in that which thus is secured. How is that right defended from invasion, for no congressional legislative declaration could be self-executing? Remedies for the wrong which is correlative to this right must be provided, and they must correspond to the nature of the right and be coextensive with it. Accordingly that wonderful weapon of equity courts, both for offense and defense, the writ of injunction, is the substantial and efficacious remedy that steps in to redress wrong by preventing wrong. It comes in at the beginning. As soon as the knowledge of the infraction of the right comes home to the owner of the right, he can appeal to the preventive justice of courts of equity and obtain an order prohibiting the wrong-doer from continuing his wrong-doing. Without that there would be no security for this right. Without that all other remedies provided for the security and protection of it would be illusory, would certainly not be adequate. It is the injunction granted upon proper prima facie evidence of the existence of the right and of its infringement, perpetuated upon final hearing upon proof of the facts at issue. The question of damages is either a question that is merely auxiliary and accessory to that, incident to it, as compensation for the infringement during the period when the cause was pending or before the bill was filed and before the injunction could have been obtained, or it may be, at the election of the owner of the patent, compensation to him in full for all that he asks; and in that case it amounts to a license; for when the owner of a patent chooses not to insist technically upon the specific enforcement of his exclusive right, but is willing to obtain money compensation in lieu of it, that is granting, during the time for which damages are recovered, a lawful license to the defendant to do that for which he thus pays.

This bill, Mr. President, in the second section undertakes to do what I believe never was undertaken before in a statute. Indeed, it undertakes to do two things in respect of which I now recollect no precedent. It undertakes to prescribe a rule of damages by statute which is not certainly usually done except in statutes of a penal character. Damages for the infringement of ordinary rights at the common law are provided by rules either of law or of practice established by judicial decisions, and are largely in the discretion of the tribunal to whom the actual computation is submitted. That is one of the very offices of a jury. It has been considered one of the very grounds of commending that institution, that the average good sense of twelve true and lawful men selected from the vicinity could judge without arbitrary, technical, artificial, and exact rule, from their common knowledge of the common affairs of men, what under the circumstances ought to be and would be a fair compensation for the injury proved. This bill not only undertakes to introduce into our jurisprudence a fixed statutory rule for the measurement and computation of damages in this specified class of cases, but it undertakes to do that by breaking down and overruling a series of judicial decisions which have been built up according to the principles of equity jurisprudence and of common law from year to year for many years until it has acquired the proportions of a system.

Mr. President, that system may not be a good one; it may not be the best. It may have been the cover for many abuses. That I do not deny; but I am very fearful that this attempt by a fixed statutory provision to set aside those decisions and to introduce a new rule will lead to far more abuses in number and far greater abuses in importance than those it is sought to remove.

I have adverted to the use of the injunction as a means for the specific protection of this exclusive right. That is not touched.

As to the question of damages, why not leave it just as the question of damages is left in any other case? If it is thought that an error has crept into the system by treating the wrong-doer in equity as a trustee for the owner of the patent, and so holding him to an account of the profits which he has made by the use of another's property, why not, then, simply content ourselves with abolishing that as the exclusive rule, and leaving the whole ground and area of compensation for damages before the jury and before the court, both as to evidence and as to argument?

The damages in one case may be no rule for damages in another. What are the damages? For the ordinary breach of a right they are that sum of money which, in the judgment of the tribunal, ought to be considered a fair compensation to the plaintiff for the loss of that of which he has been deprived by the act of the defendant. Why not allow that loss to be measured by the rules of the common law in actions at common law, by applying them to this subject-matter, and leaving open to the consideration of the court and jury every single circumstance that can properly reflect upon it? Why not leave the whole question of profits and of savings, both in the manufacture for sale and the actual sale, as well as the use of the thing patented, together with every other item of evidence which can be adduced either to show the utility or the inutility of the improvement patented, open for consideration, in order that in each case, according to its individual circumstances, the jury, if that be the tribunal selected by the party, or the court, if it be required to act as an assessor, to award damages for the ad interim breach of the right, may be at liberty to find in any of the rules of law or equity or in all the facts which may be brought to its attention by competent evidence, wherein the plaintiff has been wronged and how much he has lost, in order that he may have full compensation made to him for this loss which he has suffered? Then it would be appropriate to add to that, as is done in one of the clauses of this section, in cases of vexatious and malicious suits or defenses, such additional amount may be awarded by way of penalty proportioned to the expense of the litigation as shall make the amount awarded a full compensation not only for the breach of the right, but for the expense of maintaining it. This section does not conform to that idea. It undertakes to introduce and establish a new rule, by overthrowing in many of the cases a part of that which has been established, drawing a line of distinction where to my mind there can be no difference, excluding as it does positively and peremptorily in all cases any account of savings effected by reason of an improvement, when the very profit which otherwise is allowable may depend entirely on the fact and the amount of saving.

Therefore the section, as it seems to me, is not only impracticable, but is inconsistent, unjust, and violates fundamental provisions of constitutional law. Unless these objections are removed by what I shall hear further from the advocates of the bill, I shall be compelled, if for no other reason yet for these reasons, to vote against the entire proposed statute.

Although I have not formally submitted any such amendment, and I do not know whether the bill is in a state where it would be proper for me to move to amend it, inasmuch as there are two pending amendments I think, I would propose after the word "cases," in line 10 of the second section, to strike out all of that clause of the section down to the word "awarded" in line 23; so that the clause would then read:

If a license fee has already been established by a reasonable number of transactions applicable to the case at bar, such license fee, or a portion thereof, according to the extent and duration of the infringement proved, shall be the measure of the plaintiff's recovery in all cases.

Then leaving out that which intervenes and beginning again on line 24, it would read:

If a license fee has not already been established by a reasonable number of transactions applicable to the case at bar, a license fee for the use actually made shall be determined from all the evidence in the case.

Leaving out the words which follow in that clause down to and including the word "recovery," in line 29, the section would then continue as follows, as it now stands:

And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff or the defense of the defendant was vexatious and malicious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the defeated party such sum by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit as it shall deem just and reasonable.

Then strike out in the next clause all that follows down to the proviso, and insert in lieu of it:

No account of profits or savings shall in any case be allowed—

Meaning by that, shall be allowed as a measure of damages—

but evidence thereof may be admitted as tending to prove what shall be deemed a reasonable license fee as compensation for the infringement.

At the proper time, if this be not that time, I propose to submit the amendment I have suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

Mr. CONKLING. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Strike out lines 30 to 35 inclusive, of section 2, and insert as a substitute therefor:

And whenever the court shall be of opinion that the suit of the plaintiff or the defense of the defendant was vexatious or malicious, or the infringement was willful, the court may award against the party guilty of such vexatious or malicious conduct, or of such infringement, such sum, by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit, as it shall deem just and reasonable.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I would state, Mr. President, that I share the views of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] in relation to this section, as I expressed before the recess; and if his amendments are adopted and they can come in before mine I shall withdraw my amendments. If they are not adopted I shall insist on mine.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Then I now move, Mr. President, as an entire amendment the matters which I have stated, to wit, to strike out, after the word "cases," in line 10 of section 2, all of that clause, including the word "awarded," in line 23; and in the second clause, to strike out, beginning in line 27, the words "and if the case shall not fall within the exception aforesaid the same shall be adopted as the measure of the plaintiff's recovery." That is necessary to be stricken out if the other is. Then also I move to strike out, beginning with line 36, all that part of that clause to the proviso, and insert instead thereof the following:

No account of profits or savings shall in any case be allowed, but evidence thereof may be admitted as tending to prove what shall be deemed a reasonable license fee as compensation for the infringement.

These constitute the whole amendment. I understand by the use of the word "account" there the technical accounting as usual in equity in a suit for that purpose, compelling a discovery under oath or proof by books and papers, &c., of the details of the items in each case.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, if I correctly understand the Senator from Ohio, his first objection to the second section rests upon the unconstitutionality of that proviso allowing the appointment of an auditor by a court of law to ascertain the amount of profits made by the defendant, and making the report of that auditor prima facie evidence in the subsequent proceedings. That objection rests, as I understand, on that provision of the Constitution of the United States which requires that in all cases involving $20 and over the right of trial by jury shall be preserved.

Mr. President, if that clause of the Constitution makes this provision of the second section unconstitutional, it makes unconstitutional the laws of all those States which allow courts of law to appoint an auditor whose report shall be prima facie evidence before a jury. That is the law in my own State, and has been for a long time. I understand it to be the law in all the New England States and in the State of New York, and probably in many other States. The constitutionality of those provisions has been attacked, and the courts of the various States have uniformly, with one exception, (and that I think is in Rhode Island, and rests upon peculiar provisions which do not exist anywhere else, and of course the reason is not applicable here,) held that notwithstanding that provision of the Constitution such laws are constitutional. I am not aware that the point has ever been raised in the courts of the United States; I have been unable to find any decisions there; but with the overwhelming weight of authority in the State courts that provisions of this character do not conflict with the Constitution of the United States, the committee has deemed it proper to insert this provision in this bill, believing it to be reasonable and just.

Now, Mr. President, one object of this bill was to prevent different recoveries in different courts; to provide that the rule of recovery should be the same in courts of equity as in courts of law, and that the measure of damages in both courts should be the same. If that is to be carried out, there must be some provision for taking an account in a court of law.

The Senator from Ohio says that the absence of any provision in this bill as to the detail of procedure renders this obnoxious. Why, sir, the courts themselves, if this bill becomes a law, will make rules by which their proceedings will be governed. Can there be any doubt that a court of law can make a proper rule as to when a party shall ask for the account, as to the evidence upon which it shall be granted, as to the cases in which it is proper, and as to the mode in which that account when taken shall go to the jury? I do not see that there can be any difficulty about that.

My friend the Senator from Ohio says that this second section excludes the consideration of savings. Mr. President, it does no such thing. What are savings? Savings consist merely in the advantage which the new machine has over the old method; in that consists the utility of the machine or invention. Now, this section provides that the utility of the invention shall be one of the elements to be considered in making up what damages the plaintiff shall have. This matter of savings can be gone into as evidence to show what the license fee should be; but this section changes the law in that, whereas now the savings are considered as profits when they are not justly so, and become the measure and the inexorable measure of damages. If this section becomes a law the amount of savings or the utility of the invention becomes simply evidence to enable the tribunal to judge of what the license fee should be.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to interrupt him a moment to call his attention on that very point to the language of the bill which I think excludes the very idea that he now insists upon, because it says in the proviso "that nothing herein contained shall exclude other evidence." Other than what? Other than these very savings. And does not that exclude evidence of the savings of which it is said no account shall be taken?

Mr. WADLEIGH. It may exclude evidence of what the savings of that particular machine may have been in the case in which it has been used.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the very case where the question would arise.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The amount of savings always depends upon very many things which cannot properly be taken into the account. It depends upon the skill of the defendant, upon a great many other patented inventions perhaps, and upon many things. As the law is now, whenever it is ascertained what the amount of savings has been, they are deemed to be profits, and they become the measure of the damages of the plaintiff. The defendant has to account for the amount of those savings. As I stated the other day, those savings are not the real profits of the defendant in any case, and it is unjust to allow them to be considered so. This bill says that that account of savings shall not be evidence, but that the plaintiff may show what the machine will save, what the invention will do, how much may be made out of it, and what the advantages that it possesses are over the old method by which the same work can be done. It seems to me that that is all that should be required in reference to this matter.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, while I am not prepared to concur at present in the constitutional view presented by the Senator from Ohio, I am still much inclined to think that the amendment which he has proposed would make this bill better. I wish to see that amendment and see it in its connection, and I think every Senator would like to see the same thing. I would therefore suggest that the matter be now informally laid over and that the proposed amendment be printed, so that every Senator may see and consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion made by the Senator from Michigan? The Chair hears none, and the order will be made.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to say a word or two in reply to the Senator from Ohio. Perhaps, as what he has said is now fresh in the memory of the Senate, I had better say it at once.

It seems to me that this question about which the Senator from Ohio finds a constitutional difficulty, is a very simple one. I suppose that it is no infringement upon the constitutional right to a trial by jury in all cases involving more than $20, to make provision by law for the perfection of the mechanism in cases in regard to which the intelligent action of a jury is impracticable. Now, there are many causes which arise for trial in courts of justice, in regard to which an intelligent determination by a jury is simply impossible; and they are cases which arise upon issues joined upon pleadings at common law, cases which involve complicated and profound mathematical calculations, cases which involve surveys, cases which involve accounts including large numbers of figures to which the human memory is absolutely inadequate without the service of experts, and without the power to write down results, and without the power to make calculations, which are impossible in the ordinary course of a jury trial. For that class of cases the service of an auditor is absolutely indispensable, preserving of course the right of the jury to overrule the decision of the auditor and come to a different result whenever any mistake is pointed out by either side; and that has been held to be constitutional, if I am not mistaken, in every court in this country in which the question has been raised.

It has been a practice in the New England States and in other of the States time out of mind, and it is by no means taking from a jury the constitutional power of determining cases; it is simply supplementing and perfecting the mechanism of jury trial in cases where without such supplementing and perfecting by this additional use of the auditor a jury trial is totally inadequate and impossible. The Senator might as well claim that the use of a microscope or that the use of a yard-stick or that the use of a bushel-basket for the purpose of scrutiny or weighing or measuring if a jury should weigh and determine the result was unconstitutional as to argue at this time in the history of American jurisprudence that the use of an auditor is unconstitutional.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. MATTHEWS. If I understand him, this report of the auditor is to be submitted for the consideration of the jury.

Mr. HOAR. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Now, then, the case, as I supposed, has been commenced, and must have been, according to the bill, before the fact is known whether or not it is one of the excepted cases in which there are profits which have been made from the sale or use of the thing patented. Now, as a matter of practice, I beg to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts what would be the working of the bill after a suit has begun? The trial is on, and the fact arises in the case which necessitates its interruption in order to refer it to an auditor to make an inquiry. Then what becomes of the case? What becomes of the jury? And to what jury subsequently is this report of the auditor to be submitted? The same jury that was impaneled originally or some subsequent jury which a year or two afterward may still survive for that purpose?

Mr. HOAR. Well, Mr. President, that question is a mere restatement of the second point of the Senator from Ohio. I was dealing with the first point, the constitutional question, but I will come to the second point and answer the Senator's question.

In practice, as every Senator knows who is familiar with those jurisdictions where this method is common, that creates no difficulty. In nine cases out of ten where an auditor is desired, it is desired by both parties, and counsel inform the court before the case is reached of the necessity for an auditor. It is precisely similar to a good many cases where a master is appointed by a court of equity to examine accounts. In other cases, where the counsel are not agreed, it is usual either to give the court a brief information of the nature and character of the cause, or at any rate in very rare cases the question does not come up until the case is opened and the judge sees that such an inquiry is to be ordered. The pleadings in nine cases out of ten will so inform the court. That objection of the Senator would apply not only to all patent causes, but to all cases tried by a jury in which the services of an auditor are called in.

Then I wish to say one word in regard to the Senator's criticism upon the rule of damages laid down by this bill. The Senator does not attack this section of the bill by any suggestion that the rule of damages which it proposes is unreasonable or unjust, if I understood his very clear and lucid argument correctly, but it is that the rule of damages is prescribed by statute at all when he thinks it should be left to a jury. But certainly, Mr. President, the measure of damages in any case, whether in law or in equity, is a question of law; it is declared by the court. An erroneous declaration of the rule of damages by the court to the jury is ground of exception and new trial. So that the power which declares the law, and not the power which ascertains the facts, is the power which is to declare the rule of damages which is to prevail, and it follows from that that the rule of damages must be the same for all like cases.

Well, now it has been found that the rule of damages in these patent causes which holds the defendant to be a trustee for the plaintiff in relation to all the profits which he has made by the use of the invention in case of an infringement has in practice become an intolerable grievance. It is an intolerable grievance for two reasons: first, because ordinarily it is an incorrect rule and the injury to the plaintiff is ordinarily far short of the saving which an infringer may have made by the use of a labor-saving invention. In the next place, it is an intolerable grievance because of the opportunity which it offers for oppression of poor defendants by complainants and the oppression of poor but honest complainants by defendants. The undertaking to enter upon and to delay the final judgment of a patent cause by inquiries into the profits of vast business undertakings in which patented inventions are used occasions very often years of delay and the most enormous expenditure, and it is the one blot on the patent law. The large number of persons before us, representing all the interests of inventors, infringers, lawyers, plaintiffs, defendants, all agree that complainants are often debarred from asserting and maintaining just claims by the cost of being compelled to go into these expensive and protracted investigations when they were required by the defendants, and that on the other hand the defendant was overburdened by costs and delay and to his ruin by being compelled to go into this class of investigation; and, therefore, the committee were of opinion that on the whole justice was best attained by adopting the simple, clear, practical rule which is set forth in the second section, which, although not absolutely complete for all cases, is the most complete practical rule for all cases which the committee, hearing all interests, have been able to devise.

If that be true, and we are justified in affirming to the Senate that it is the result of the greatest experience in patent causes in this country so far as we can learn that result, then it seems to me that it is proper for the law-making power to enact a rule of law by which damages are to be assessed hereafter just as much as it was proper for the Judiciary in the beginning to declare, in the absence of the statute enactment, the rule which they would lay down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the pending amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The motion of the Senator from Michigan was to have the bill laid over and the amendment printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the suggestion to be made that the amendment be printed, but did not understand that the bill should be laid over.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. He said temporarily laid over, at any rate until we could get the amendment in print.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I have one word to say which is suggested to me by the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts upon the constitutional question which is raised by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. President, although the Constitution gives an exclusive right to an inventor to his invention or discovery, I do not therefore think it incompetent for Congress to provide a remedy and in the providing of that remedy to provide rules of damages or as to amounts of recovery. All the duty which devolves upon Congress in that direction is that they shall give a competent remedy for the violation of the patentees' rights, and it makes no difference in my view what that form may be so that it remains a competent remedy and will give an adequate compensation.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I propose to offer an amendment to the seventh section. It was intended to be inserted by the committee when they reported the bill, but was omitted by accident. All the members of the committee assent to it, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire the amendment to be printed?

Mr. HOAR. I submit the amendment, and would like to have it printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I offer a similar amendment, which has been agreed to by the committee, and which was handed me by the chairman, on going away, with the request that I should submit it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have it printed?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I renew the suggestion which I made a little while ago that this bill be informally laid aside until to-morrow, and that in the mean time the amendments be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the pending bill being informally laid aside until to-morrow?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I shall not insist upon it if the committee oppose it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the bill being informally laid aside until to-morrow, then to be resumed as the unfinished business? The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I wish to move an amendment to the fifth section, which I submit to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order to be printed will be made.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the Senator's amendment read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to section 5:

Provided, That it shall not be lawful to grant any reissue of any patent for any invention except the invention which was embraced in the original patent.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Calendar of general orders is now before the Senate. The Secretary will report the first bill.

The first business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) authorizing Captain Jonathan Young, of the United States Navy, to accept a betel-nut box and a silver medal from the Emperor of Siam.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 14, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. W. V. TUDOR, Methodist Episcopal Church South, Saint Louis, Missouri.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HASKELL. I move that there be so much of a morning hour this morning as will permit the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills. There was no morning hour yesterday for that purpose.

Mr. McMAHON. I object.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope we will have a morning hour for the introduction of bills.

Mr. McMAHON. I object.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

THE LATE ALPHEUS S. WILLIAMS.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to include in the sundry civil appropriation bill an item appropriating a sum sufficient to pay the widow of the late Alpheus S. Williams, late a Representative from the State of Michigan, the amount he would have received for the remainder of the term for which he was elected.

Mr. COX, of New York. Why cannot we also include in that resolution a provision for the salary of the late Representative from Texas, Hon. Mr. Schleicher?

The SPEAKER. That has already been provided for.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HUBBELL. I desire to give notice that on Thursday, the 6th day of February next, I will call up the resolution in relation to eulogies upon my late colleague, Mr. Williams.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMAHON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to submit a privileged report.

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me to ask an order of the House for the printing of certain documents for the use of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] demands the regular order. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] is on the floor by reason of his right to submit a conference report; and he has no power to yield the floor for some other purpose.

Mr. DURHAM. If I had the power I would yield; but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] calls for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is in the power of the gentleman to take the floor upon a privileged report and then parcel it out to others.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. DURHAM. I submit the report which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 5230, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 9, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$900;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$1,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$2,100;" and the Senate agree to the same.

M. J. DURHAM,
A. HERR SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
HENRY G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DURHAM. There were three or four points of difference between the two Houses, the main one being Senate amendment No. 7 appropriating $3,000 for apparatus for illustrating the science of electricity as applied to the useful arts. We have agreed to appropriate half the sum proposed, $1,500. This was the principal item of difference between the two Houses. If no gentleman desires to make any further inquiry, I ask a vote on the adoption of the report.

The report was adopted.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMAHON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state the situation of the business of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] allow me to ask the printing of some papers?

Mr. McMAHON. We have substantially two hours to-day for debate upon the Geneva award bill. A great many measures are being pressed upon the attention of the House in antagonism to each other; and I feel that I cannot do otherwise——

Mr. COX, of New York. I object to discussion.

Mr. McMAHON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that to-day was fixed by the unanimous consent of the House for the consideration of the bill known as the Mississippi levee bill, reported from the committee on that subject.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. Does that bill override other special orders previously made?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the order of the House on that subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, by unanimous consent the bill of the House No. 4318, to provide for the organization of the Mississippi River improvement commission, and for the correction, permanent location, and deepening of the channel and the improvement of the navigation of said river, reported on the 22d of May last, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, was made a special order therein for Tuesday, January 14, 1879, to the exclusion of all prior special orders.

Mr. HALE. I rise to the question of the order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HALE. The Geneva award bill which has been debated for some days has come over from day to day; and if nothing else should interpose would be resumed this morning, and could be easily disposed of to-day. Many gentlemen who have taken an interest in this matter would be glad to have it out of the way so that it will no longer block other business. Now, in view of what may be the ruling of the Chair upon the special order in reference to the levees, represented by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] I suggest to him that he refrain from antagonizing that bill with the business which has been running for several days—the Geneva award bill; and I ask the Chair as a matter of parliamentary law whether if a motion in the nature of raising the question of consideration be made to postpone the levee bill until Thursday next, a majority of the House cannot so postpone it, and whether it will not in that case retain all the rights for Thursday next that it has to-day.

The SPEAKER. It has generally been held that the House by a majority vote has power to postpone a special order. This special order seems to have been fixed for the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole, and if there be no objection on either side that fact affords a ready solution of the present difficulty; so that, without dispute or controversy, a vote could be had to-day upon the Geneva award bill, the Mississippi levee bill retaining for Thursday next all the rights which it possesses to-day.

Mr. HALE. I trust the gentleman from Louisiana will agree to this proposition.

Mr. GIBSON. I hope my colleague, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] the chairman of the committee on this subject, will accede to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine. It should be perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I accept the proposition of the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the arrangement proposed?

Mr. BUCKNER. Is the consideration of the levee bill confined by the existing order to this day?

The SPEAKER. It is, according to the terms of the order.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then to-morrow any other business may come up.

The SPEAKER. To-morrow has been assigned for the consideration of business from the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. EDEN. Then the levee bill, when it comes up on Thursday, will have only that one day.

The SPEAKER. But one day.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will it have its day except by general consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that a majority of the House can postpone the special order of to-day until Thursday next. In a moment the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] to test the sense of the House (as the Chair understands he desires to do) as between the Geneva award bill and the bill granting pensions to soldiers of the Mexican war. The Chair desires to clear away one difficulty at a time.

Mr. MONEY. Do I understand that, as respects the right of the Mississippi Levee Committee, Thursday is to be substituted for to-day?

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition, to which the Chair hears no objection.

Now the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] raises the question of consideration against the Geneva award bill, desiring to bring up for consideration the bill granting pensions to soldiers of the war with Mexico. This question can be determined by a majority of the House.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a vote on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, the object being to reach the bill granting pensions to the soldiers of the war with Mexico.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will consent to have the question settled by a division.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 104, not voting 70, as follows:

So the motion to go into committee was agreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. CARLISLE said: My colleague, Mr. MCKENZIE, is paired with Mr. POWERS. If present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. GUNTER. My colleague, Mr. GAUSE, is absent on account of sickness. If here, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. STONE, of Michigan. I am paired on this and on all political questions with Mr. SHELLEY, of Alabama.

Mr. BROWNE. My colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, is confined to his room by indisposition. If he were present, he would vote in the negative.

Mr. MARTIN. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, who is necessarily absent, would, if present, vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am paired on this question with Mr. WAIT, of Connecticut. I would vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. By the vote just taken the House has resolved to go into committee for the purpose of considering the bill granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars; and for the present to postpone the further considération of the unfinished business, which is the Geneva award bill.

PENSIONS FOR MEXICAN AND OTHER WARS.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. EDEN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 257) granting a pension to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars therein named, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. All general debate on the pending bill is exhausted, and the Clerk will read the first section and then the amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including militia and volunteers of the military and naval services of the United States, who served sixty days in the war of 1846 and 1847 with Mexico, or in the Creek war of 1835 and 1836, or in the Florida or Black Hawk war for thirty days and were honorably discharged, and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said wars, although their term of service may have been less than sixty days, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men as were married to such officers or soldiers or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the pending amendment offered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, from which the bill originally came.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to know whether this bill is now in the condition when amendments can be offered to it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will first read the amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HALE. Nobody has been able this morning, Mr. Chairman, to get a copy of this bill, and I therefore wish to ask whether the opportunity of offering amendments, aside from those printed, will be lost if this proceeding goes on any further?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is now being read by section for amendment, and the amendment offered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions will first be disposed of and then the section will be open to further amendment.

Mr. HALE. The amendment proposed to be read is the amendment reported by the committee to the first section?

The CHAIRMAN. It is; and the same proceeding will be had in reference to the other sections.

Mr. HALE. The Chair will see the difficulty we are laboring under, as we have not copies of the bill and cannot get any.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the amendment reported to the first section by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 9, 10, and 11, which read as follows: "Or in the Creek war of 1835 and 1836, or in the Florida or Black Hawk war for thirty days;" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "Who served thirty days in the Creek war or disturbances of 1835 and 1836, or in the Florida war with the Seminoles from 1835 to 1842, or the Black Hawk war of 1832;" so the section, if amended, will read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including militia and volunteers, of the military and naval services of the United States, who served sixty days in the war of 1846 and 1847 with Mexico, who served thirty days in the Creek war or disturbances of 1835 and 1836, or in the Florida war with the Seminoles from 1835 to 1842, or the Black Hawk war of 1832, and were honorably discharged, and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said wars, although their term of service may have been less than sixty days, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men as were married to such officers or soldiers or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] where we can get the printed copy of this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments, the Chair is informed, are printed with the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. The word "or" immediately following "Mexico," in the ninth line, was stricken out by mistake. That ought to be inserted in the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask that it may be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire briefly to state the effect of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate has been closed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object unless others can have the same opportunity to speak on the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Not while the committee is dividing. The question is on the adoption of the amendment which has just been read.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 65, noes 71.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 91.

So the amendment reported by the committee was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 20 of the bill, after the word "days," insert the following:

Provided, however, That no such person shall be entitled to a pension until he shall have arrived at the age of sixty years, unless such person shall be, from disease or other infirmity, unable to earn his living by manual labor.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment to the amendment, to strike out "sixty" and insert "seventy-five."

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand the Chair to say that no remarks on amendments which may be offered are in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. HOOKER. May I be permitted to inquire of the Chair why debate is not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. All debate was closed by order of the House before going into Committee.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Is not debate in order under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate was closed before going into Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will read the order which was made on the 27th February, 1878.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GOLDSMITH W. HEWITT moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Pending which,

Mr. HEWITT further moved that all debate on the bill of the House (H. R. 257) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars therein named, pending therein, terminate in one hour and ten minutes when the House next resolves itself into the said committee.

Mr. HOOKER. I submit to the Chair that the debate which was closed by order of the House was general debate. All general debate was closed by the order which the Chair has just caused to be read; but I think the Chair is mistaken in supposing that that order of the House directing what course should be adopted when the House went into Committee of the Whole cut off the five-minute debate which is allowed by the rules upon the amendments that may be offered. I say this because I desire to oppose the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois has just offered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call the attention of the Chair to Rule 60, which provides:

No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House, or in committee, but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close the debate: Provided, That where debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed, in committee, five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer.

Now we have just reached that stage in the consideration of this bill in Committee of the Whole where debate has been closed by order of the House and a member may debate an amendment for five minutes and then the member getting the floor next may oppose the amendment for five minutes. There can be no suspension of this rule except on Mondays and by a two-third vote of the House, and that has not been done.

I desire further to call the attention of the Chair to the last proviso of this rule. It is:

That the House may by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph of a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph, or at their election upon the pending amendments only.

We have not yet reached that stage to which this clause of the rule applies, the five-minute debate not having taken place upon the amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If the point of order had been raised when my motion to close debate was made, the motion might have been ruled out of order as being in conflict with the rule to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has called the attention of the Chair. But the motion was made to close all debate—not general debate, but all debate upon this bill; and no objection having been made to the form of the motion and no point of order having been raised upon it, it seems to me that the gentleman from Illinois is now debarred from invoking the application of the rule to which he has alluded.

Mr. SPRINGER. The motion made by the gentleman from Alabama was the usual motion to close all general debate. That was understood to be its effect, otherwise objection would have been made. If the effect of the order was to close all debate absolutely it would cut off all debate on the various sections of the bill and compel the committee directly to vote on every proposition without hearing it explained, which certainly was not contemplated at the time the order was made.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I will state that it was not my object when I made the motion to cut off debate under the five-minute rule. That was not my intention, and I thought that the bill was still open to debate under the five-minute rule. I think, however, the ruling of the Chair is technically right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order which has been raised. The usual order made as to closing debate is that all general debate be closed within a limited time, and when an order is made closing general debate amendments which are offered are then debated under the five-minute rule.

The order having been made closing all debate without any objection in the House the Chair thinks it was equivalent to a suspension of the rules and that all debate is closed on the bill, and he therefore rules that debate is not in order.

Mr. TIPTON. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of opening this question of debate.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If the gentleman will hear me for a moment he will see that that cannot be done.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to speak to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is already decided, and the gentleman cannot be heard unless he wishes to take an appeal.

The question was put upon Mr. TIPTON's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 78, noes 72.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. TIPTON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 87.

The CHAIRMAN. Before announcing the result of the vote, the Chair wishes to be indulged a moment, for he desires to reverse the ruling made a short time ago. Upon further examination the Chair is now satisfied that the order to close debate on this bill was in the usual form, the closing of the debate under the hour rule. The Chair acted under a misapprehension in reference to the wording of the resolution closing debate. He reverses his former decision.

Mr. TIPTON. I desire, then, to withdraw my motion that the committee rise. [Cries of "Object!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Then the committee has determined to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. EDEN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 257) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars therein named, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 257) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and, pending that motion, I move that all debate upon the pending section of the bill and amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. REED. That is section 1?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether it is competent to set aside an order of this House which was made, if I mistake not, more than a year ago, limiting debate upon this question, and whether the time has not passed in which the House could reconsider the entry of that order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has not reconsidered it; nor is it proposed that it shall do so. By the ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole the bill is subject to debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask whether during the month of February last the House did not limit debate by its order upon this bill; and, if so, whether the time has not expired within which the House can reconsider that order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no reconsideration proposed of the order referred to. By the ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House that order did not go to the extent of cutting off debate under the five-minute rule, and no appeal having been taken from that decision in Committee of the Whole, the question cannot be further considered by the House at this time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The inquiry I submit is simply whether it is in the power of the House now, by any action it may take, to rescind or reconsider the order hitherto made and entered upon this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That question is not before the House at this time. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HEWITT,] that all debate upon the pending section and the amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I understand the Speaker to say that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole has ruled that five minutes' debate is in order in committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so stated.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I did not so understand it.

The question was taken upon the motion to limit debate upon the first section of the bill to twenty minutes; and, on a division, there were—ayes 93, noes 87.

Mr. TIPTON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. TIPTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 95.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, forty members voting therefor.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, and it is this: Does it not require a two-third vote of the House to extend the time for debate, as proposed by the mover of this motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Can a majority——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Rule 104 is applicable to this case.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Then the effect of this motion, if carried, will be to cut off the five-minute debate on the first section of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the end of twenty minutes. The yeas and nays have been ordered on this question.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 124, nays 105, not voting 59; as follows:

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. CABELL, is paired with Mr. PUGH, of New Jersey.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 5503) to remove the political disabilities of James Chesnut, of South Carolina.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indians tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 1574) for the erection of a fire-proof building for the National Museum; and

A bill (S. No. 1592) for the relief of Henry C. De Ahna, late collector of customs at Sitka, Alaska.

PENSIONS FOR MEXICAN AND OTHER WARS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs upon the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 257) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars therein named.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. And on that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Let them have the yeas and nays. We want to see who are the friends of the soldier.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GOODE. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] was "that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the Mexican pension bill, and that the debate upon the pending section and amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] to move that the House go into Committee of the Whole, and then to state that "pending that motion" he would move that all debate upon the pending section and amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes. The question was first put upon the motion limiting debate, which has been agreed to. The question now recurs upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, upon which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 124, nays 94, not voting 70; as follows:

So the motion to go into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SOUTHARD. My colleague, Mr. FINLEY, is absent on account of illness.

Mr. ACKLEN. I am paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. CALKINS. If he were here, I should vote in the affirmative.

Mr. PRICE. I am paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. STEPHENS.

Mr. BROWNE. My colleague from Indiana, Mr. ROBINSON, who is confined to his room by indisposition, would, if he were present, vote "no."

Mr. STONE, of Michigan. I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. SHELLEY.

Mr. BOONE. My colleague, Mr. MCKENZIE, is paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. POWERS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. On all questions connected with this bill my colleague, Mr. WALKER, is paired with the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. WAIT.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. EDEN in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 257) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars therein named.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House all debate on the first section of the bill and amendments thereto will terminate in twenty minutes. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON.]

The amendment to the amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out "sixty" and insert "seventy-five;" so that, if amended, the amendment will read:

Provided, however, That no such person shall be entitled to a pension until he shall have arrived at the age of seventy-five years, unless such person shall be, from disease or other infirmity, unable to earn his sustenance by manual labor.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I cannot see any justice or propriety in the proposed amendment to the amendment; nor did I see any propriety or justice in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON.] Thirty years after the close of the war with Mexico a proposition is introduced from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, in the bill of which my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] has charge, to give a pension to the soldiers of that war. As long ago as 1872 it was estimated that there were but six thousand of these soldiers of the Mexican war surviving who were to be pensioned under the terms of the bill now before the House; and the amount which would be annually expended would of course decrease as the numbers of these were by mortality diminished from year to year. Upon an estimate made by the committee in the report which is submitted with this bill it was demonstrated that the amount to be paid, predicated upon the idea that there are the number of survivors I mention, would not exceed a million and a half or two million dollars per annum—but a fragment of the gross amount which you annually appropriate to support and maintain the standing Army of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, after these soldiers have rendered this service to the Government and have risked their lives in maintaining our flag in a war with a foreign country, surely there can be no justice or equity or good sound common sense in saying that you will discriminate against a man because he has not had the misfortune to arrive at the age of sixty or seventy-five years. The amendment would probably have better effected the object which it had in view if it had said that no man should be entitled to the benefits of the bill, no man should receive the pension of the Government for services rendered in the maintenance of its flag, unless he had arrived at the age of one hundred years. There can be no sense in such a discrimination unless it is intended to limit the application of the bill solely to those who may come within the class of invalid soldiers; and if this was the purpose, then it had better be so expressed, because, if the principle attempted to be ingrafted upon the bill is a correct one, if it is a proper rule to be incorporated in our legislation, then no amount of years can render more sacred the services which the soldier has given to his country. Hence, I say that there is nothing in the amendment except a proposition to confine the operation of the bill to those who would come within the class of invalid pensioners.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, this bill offers a gratuity to soldiers who fought in our wars. I believe that the men who thus fought, fought from motives of patriotism, not in expectation of any reward other than that they would derive from the satisfaction of having benefited their country. But, sir, there is a large number of these men who fought in Mexico who have become disabled from years or because the relics of disease acquired in Mexico are to-day striking them out of the list of that class of men who can earn their own livelihood. But there are many of them, a large number of them, hale, healthy, stalwart men, who I do not believe want the pittance the Government would give them if this bill were passed. There are upon the floor of this Congress three men, I believe, all younger than myself, yet hale and healthy, who fought in Mexico.

A MEMBER. We are all younger than you are—everybody is younger than you are. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I will not answer that. I am too prone to throw back a joke, but I will not answer that now. [Laughter.] I am serious in the objection which I urge to this bill. These men come here and appeal to Congress for a recompense for the aid they gave the Government in long years past. Of that class of men those who are under sixty years of age, and are hale and hearty, I do not believe care to have it. And if we go on to give pensions to every man because he has fought, then how long will it be before that vast army which fought in our last war will be pleading here this precedent, and asking also to have pensions granted to them, which must inevitably result in bankrupting the Government? Now, when they shall have arrived at the age when they cannot support themselves, I believe the Government of the United States will grant them a pension, but not until then. I think, therefore, this amendment is one which appeals so thoroughly to the sense of right and justice of every member that I do not think it necessary even to discuss it further.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, to the amendment of Mr. HARRISON.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 77, no quorum voting.

Mr. WRIGHT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 96.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to take issue in opinion with the gentleman from Mississippi who has estimated the number of persons who might apply for pensions under the provisions of this bill. It will be noticed it is not the soldiers of any one war, but I believe every war since, if not including, the war Nimrod originally engaged in is now included in the provisions of this bill. [Laughter.] I may undertake to say with great confidence that sixty thousand instead of six thousand will apply for pensions under its provisions if in the providence of God this bill should ever become a law. [Laughter.]

We were told here that the old soldiers of 1812-'15 were all dead or pretty nearly so. Those men average eighty years and upward, and yet the applications under that law, I understand, fall very little short of forty thousand.

The men who served in most of these wars have only lived some forty, thirty, or twenty-eight years since the conclusion of those wars, and the probability is that the great body of those men are alive. If they are not alive their widows are alive, and besides many of them have minor children alive. It will be found, I believe, that it will saddle on this country pensions to forty thousand men.

Let me call the attention of the committee to the feeling this House gets up now and then as to the burdens resting upon the people. How I have wept and mourned here when the tax on whisky was debated in this House as a burden upon the people, [laughter;] and when the tax on tobacco was debated in this House as a burden resting on this people that called for our sympathy and called for the intervention of the Government! [Laughter.] Where is the wind to come from, where are the means to come from to pay these burdens? No man shall go in advance of me in honoring the men who served their country. I stand ready now to vote for every man who is lame, or sick, or disordered from services he has rendered to his country in any war; but here it is proposed to pay men who are independent. No matter how rich, no matter how prosperous, no matter what is the salary the individual is earning, yet if he has served in any of all these myriad wars we propose to put our hands into the Treasury to-day while the country is staggering under the burden it is carrying and dole out a pension to him. I protest against it. It is not statesmanship.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. The amendment to the amendment limiting pensions to be granted under this bill to soldiers who are seventy-five years of age having failed, I move as an amendment to the amendment that the benefits of this bill shall be limited to those who are under disabilities from wounds or because of disease contracted in service, or to those who are seventy years of age.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I withdrew my formal amendment.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I so understood, and I have moved to strike out "seventy-five" in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois and insert "seventy."

I have only a word to utter in addition to what my friend from New York has so properly said. When last year we passed a bill pensioning the old soldiers of the war of 1812 we were told it was a mere bagatelle, that it would amount to nothing. Instead of that, however, we now find it has largely exceeded the estimate made by the friends of that measure. But in addition to that, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the provisions of this bill are unfair to the soldiers in the war against the rebellion; for, if you will observe, no disability is required to entitle an individual who served in the Mexican or in any of these other wars mentioned in the bill against the Indians, the Black Hawk or the Florida War—that no disability is required to entitle him to a pension. Now, it is a well-known fact that many of the men who participated in the Mexican war are now in the full vigor of life. From the statistics it will be seen that many went into the Mexican war at seventeen years of age. It was thirty-two years ago, and seventeen and thirty-two will only make forty-nine. But taking twenty as a fair average, that would only give fifty-two years as the age of the survivors of the Mexican war.

Now, I submit it is unfair to make so sweeping a provision in behalf of the soldiers of the Mexican war, which is comparatively recent, and deny the same benevolent provisions in behalf of the soldiers who fought in the war against the rebellion. Why, sir, I can recall to my mind many gentlemen who are in affluent circumstances, in a prosperous position in life, one of whom has recently been elected to the United States Senate from the State of Texas, a man in the vigor of life, who will be benefited by the provisions of this bill. As long as the bill providing for the arrearages of pension to our own wounded soldiers, the Union soldiers in the war against the rebellion, is undisposed of, I am against the provisions of this bill without limiting it to the same class of persons who appeal to the sympathy and benevolence of this House.

Mr. HOOKER, and Mr. HEWITT of Alabama, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending section, and all amendments thereto. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, to strike out "sixty" and to insert "seventy."

Mr. HOOKER. Do I understand the Chair to say that the time for debate, limited by the House, has expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate on the pending section and amendments thereto has expired.

Mr. HOOKER. Then I shall take occasion to say something in reply to the gentleman on the other side when another section is under discussion.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, to the amendment of Mr. HARRISON, there were—ayes 50, noes 85.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 20 of the bill, after the word "days," insert the following:

Provided, however, That no such person shall be entitled to a pension until he shall have arrived at the age of sixty years; unless such person shall be, from disease or other infirmity, unable to earn his subsistence by manual labor.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 72, noes 79.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GOODE. I desire to offer an amendment, which I understand is agreed to by the chairman of the committee. I move to amend by adding, after the word "States," in line 7, the following:

And the officers and men of the revenue marine service.

The question being taken on agreeing to Mr. GOODE's amendment, there were—ayes 55, noes 35.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. A quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. GOODE, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. GOODE. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent to say a single word in support of the amendment?

Several members objected.

Mr. GOODE. I ask that the amendment be reported again. I am sure if gentlemen understood it they would vote for it.

The amendment was again read.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 114, noes 33.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 48, noes 86.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. A quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is not required on a vote that the committee rise.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SINNICKSON. I offer the following amendment:

Amend by inserting after the word "Mexico," in line 9, section 1, the words "or who served sixty days in the military or naval service of the United States in the war of 1861 for the suppression of the rebellion."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HALE. Let the section be reported as it will read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including militia and volunteers of the military and naval services of the United States, and the officers and men of the revenue-marine service who served sixty days in the war of 1846 and 1847 with Mexico, or who served sixty days in the military or naval service of the United States in the war of 1861 for the suppression of the rebellion, or in the Creek war of 1835 and 1836, or in the Florida or Black Hawk war for thirty days and were honorably discharged, and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said wars, although their term of service may have been less than sixty days, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men as were married to such officers or soldiers or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

Add the words "or in the Oregon and Washington war of 1855 and 1856."

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SINNICKSON] as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] just adopted by the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to ask a question: whether gentlemen who served in the late war and who would be benefited by this amendment are entitled to vote on it?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HARRISON. This is not debate; it is a parliamentary inquiry.

The question being taken on agreeing to Mr. SINNICKSON's amendment as amended, there were—ayes 81, noes 79.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, and Mr. SINNICKSON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 88.

So Mr. SINNICKSON's amendment as amended was agreed to. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I give notice that I shall ask for a vote upon this amendment in the House. [Cries of "That's right!"]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama, offered the following amendment:

Amend by inserting after the words "eighteen hundred and thirty-six," in the tenth line, the words "and eighteen hundred and thirty-seven."

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BRAGG. I offer the following amendment, to come in immediately after the amendment, which has already been adopted, allowing pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1861:

And to the officers and soldiers who may be engaged in the next war, and the widows and children of such officers and soldiers who may be killed therein.

[Laughter.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. There will be no republicans in that war.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I raise the point of order that such an amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know of any reason why it is not in order.

The question was taken on Mr. BRAGG's amendment, and there were—ayes 2, noes 23; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BRAGG and Mr. SINNICKSON were appointed.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 4, noes 78; no quorum voting.

Mr. BRAGG. Will it be in order for me to withdraw the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can withdraw it by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "Mexico," in line 9, down to the word "and," in line 16; in other words, all that refers to Indian wars of all characters.

The Clerk read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

Or in the Creek war of 1835 and 1836, or in the Florida and Black Hawk wars for thirty days.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move an amendment to the amendment. I move to strike out all after the word "Mexico" down to and including the words "eighteen hundred and thirty-two," in line 16, and including the amendment which was adopted a few moments ago in relation to the Indian wars in Oregon and the late war of the rebellion.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I raise the question of order that the committee cannot strike out that which it has just inserted.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. My amendment will leave the bill providing simply for pensioning the soldiers of the Mexican war.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I raise the question of order that the motion is out of order inasmuch as the committee cannot strike out that which it has just inserted. It can hardly be necessary for me to say anything upon that point of order. It is a well-known rule of parliamentary law that a Committee of the Whole cannot reconsider its action, and consequently this motion to strike out what it has just inserted is not in order.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It is true that I could not move under the rules to strike out the amendment which has been adopted, standing by itself; but it is a very different thing to move to strike out the amendment as adopted and a portion of the original text, that relating to the Indian wars. My amendment is not to strike out merely what has been adopted by the committee.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that both the portions of the section as it now stands which he proposes to strike out were inserted by the committee; a portion of what he proposes to strike out was inserted upon his own motion.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman is simply mistaken in what he has stated. The committee reported an amendment, but the Committee of the Whole refused to insert it, and the section stands now as originally reported by the committee.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Let us understand this matter. I understood that the gentleman's motion was to strike out that which is printed in italics in the bill and also that which has been inserted by the committee on motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SINNICKSON.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. When we first took up the bill this morning the Committee of the Whole refused to insert the amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and hence it has not been inserted. The words I propose to strike out are after the word "Mexico," the words "or in the Creek wars of 1835 and 1836, or in the Florida and Black Hawk wars."

Mr. CAMP. And you propose to strike out the amendment also which has been adopted on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Certainly, so that if my amendment is adopted the bill will only provide pensions for the soldiers of the Mexican war.

The CHAIRMAN. On page 154 of the Manual we find the following:

Although it is not in order to strike out by itself what has been inserted, it may be moved to strike out a portion of the original paragraph, comprehending what has been inserted, provided the coherence to be struck out be so substantial as to make this effectively a different proposition.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois proposes to strike out simply the provisions in relation to soldiers of the Indian wars. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] as an amendment to that proposes to strike out that in connection with what has been inserted, giving pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1861 and of the Oregon Indian wars, and the Chair is of opinion that according to the Manual the amendment is in order.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama by commencing in line 7, and embracing in the motion to strike out that part which includes soldiers of the Mexican war.

The CHAIRMAN. There is now pending an amendment and an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. Then I offer mine as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HEWITT.] My substitute is to strike out all of the first section as amended from and including the word "who," after the words "United States," in the seventh line. If we are going to strike out let us begin pretty near the head.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I make the point of order that the proposed substitute is simply an amendment, and therefore an amendment in the third degree and not in order.

Mr. BURCHARD. The Chair will find by reference to the rules that a substitute is in order. The rules provide that there may be an amendment and an amendment to an amendment, a substitute and an amendment to the substitute, all pending at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] will please send up his amendment to the Clerk.

Mr. BURCHARD. I can state it I think so that it will be understood. My proposition is to substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] and the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] a motion to strike out of the section all after the words "United States" in line 7.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And my point of order is that that is an amendment in the third degree and not in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. A question of order is now pending. After that question shall have been determined the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] to submit the motion he has indicated. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read from the Manual some paragraphs bearing upon the point of orders.

The Clerk read as follows:

An amendment may be moved to an amendment, but it is not admitted in another degree. But it is a well-settled practice of the House that there may be pending, at the same time with such amendment to the amendment, an amendment in the nature of a substitute for part or the whole of the original text, and an amendment to that substitute.

* * * * * * *

So, now, notwithstanding the pendency of a motion to amend an amendment to the original matter, a motion to amend in the nature of a substitute, and a motion to amend that amendment, may be received, but cannot be voted upon until the original matter is perfected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the substitute is in order, and therefore overrules the point of order.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 5067) to divide the western district of Missouri into two divisions, and to prescribe the time and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes.

PENSIONS FOR SOLDIERS OF MEXICAN WAR.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the substitute moved by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I make the further point of order that the vote must be first taken upon my amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first upon the motion that the committee now rise.

The motion was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 67, noes 78.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois on the right of the Chair [Mr. HARRISON] and the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HEWITT.] The section will be reported as it will stand should the substitute be adopted.

Mr. BURCHARD. I will modify my substitute so as to strike out all of the section as amended from the words "United States," in line 7, down to and including the word "and," in line 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The section will be read as it will stand if the substitute as modified shall be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including militia and volunteers of the military and naval service of the United States who were honorably discharged, and of such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said wars, although their terms of service may have been less than sixty days, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men as were married to such officers or soldiers or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried.

Mr. HALE. There must be some mistake in the reading, because the section read as proposed to be amended leaves out the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SINNICKSON] giving pensions to the soldiers of the war of the rebellion. Now, what I want to know is where that amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SINNICKSON] will be if the proposed substitute is adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute proposes to strike out the portion of the section including that amendment.

Mr. HALE. Then I move to amend the substitute so that it will strike out all of that portion of the section except the part relative to the soldiers engaged in the war of the rebellion.

Mr. BURCHARD. I accept that amendment.

Mr. HALE. That will leave in the bill the provision which was incorporated on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SINNICKSON.]

The CHAIRMAN. The section will now be read as it will stand if amended by the adoption of the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] as modified upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including militia and volunteers of the Army and naval service of the United States, who served sixty days in the military or naval service of the United States in the war of 1861 for the suppression of the rebellion, or in the Oregon and Washington Indian war of 1855 and 1856, and who were honorably discharged; and of such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said wars, although their terms of service may have been less than sixty days, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men as were married to such officers or soldiers or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried.

Mr. HALE. My motion is to strike out the whole section except that part relating to the Union soldiers in the war of the rebellion; and this is accepted by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.] The section as thus modified provides simply for pensioning the men engaged as Union soldiers in the war of the rebellion. I ask the Clerk to read what is embodied in my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after "Mexico," in line 9, section 1, the words "or who served sixty days in the military or naval service of the United States, in the war of 1861, for the suppression of the rebellion."

Mr. HALE. No; my motion is to substitute those words in lieu of the words proposed to be struck out by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. HOOKER. I make a point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] I submit that it is an amendment in the third degree, and is therefore not in order. An amendment was offered by some gentleman on the other side to include in this bill the soldiers of 1861 who served in the Union Army. That amendment was adopted, and subsequently another amendment was adopted including those who served in certain Indian wars in 1865 and 1866. Now the proposition of the gentleman from Maine is certainly an amendment in the third degree. The whole thing seems to be a stab at the soldiers of the Mexican war whom gentlemen on the other side do not intend to pension.

Mr. SINNICKSON. I raise the point that debate is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. In reference to the point raised by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] the Chair understands the rule to be that where an amendment to an amendment is pending it is still in order to move a substitute for the amendment and the amendment to the amendment, and also to move to amend such substitute. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] having accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, the substitute is the question now pending before the committee.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to modify my amendment so that instead of striking out the whole of the section it shall strike out down to and including the words "thirty-two," in line 16, leaving so much as relates to the discharge of soldiers, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. The section as proposed to be amended by the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] as modified, will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted men, including militia and volunteers, in the military and naval services of the United States who served sixty days in the military or naval service of the United States in the war of 1861 for the suppression of the rebellion, and were honorably discharged; and to such other officers and soldiers and sailors as may have been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in said wars, although their term of service may have been less than sixty days, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted men as were married to such officers or soldiers or sailors prior to the discharge of such officers and enlisted men: Provided, That such widows have not remarried.

Mr. HALE. That is exactly my amendment. It proposes simply to pension——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOOKER. I make the point of order that this is an amendment in the third degree, and therefore is not in order.

Mr. HALE. That point has been decided.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment being a substitute for the amendment and the amendment to the amendment, is in order, in the opinion of the Chair. The question is now on the adoption of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois as modified by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I make the point of order that the substitute cannot be voted upon until the matter proposed to be stricken out is perfected. That has been the decision time and again, as the Chair will see by reference to pages 155 and 156 of the Manual. I call the attention of the Chair to the last clause of the first paragraph on page 105:

"And a motion to amend that amendment may be received but cannot be voted upon until the original matter is perfected."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments all apply to the text of the bill, and consequently the point of order made by the gentleman from Colorado does not apply. The question is on the adoption of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to state what the effect of the amendment is. [Cries of "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SINNICKSON. I ask for the reading of the section as proposed to be amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The section as proposed to be amended by the substitute has just been read.

Mr. HALE. Now let us have a vote.

The question being taken upon the substitute of Mr. BURCHARD as modified, there were—ayes 83, noes 85.

Mr. SINNICKSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BURCHARD, and Mr. HEWITT of Alabama, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 97.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair votes in the negative, and the substitute is rejected.

Mr. WADDELL. I move that the committee now rise.

The question being taken on agreeing to the motion, there were—ayes 72, noes 80.

Mr. SINNICKSON called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SINNICKSON, and Mr. HEWITT of Alabama, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 79.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. EDEN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 257) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 605) for the relief of William M. Kendall;

An act (S. No. 893) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to examine the evidence of payments made by the State of Missouri since April 17, 1866, to the officers and privates of the militia forces of said State for military services actually performed in the suppression of the rebellion, in full concert and co-operation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their orders, and to make report thereof to Congress; and

An act (H. R. No. 5503) to remove the political disabilities of James Chesnut, of South Carolina.

COMMITTEE VACANCIES FILLED.

The SPEAKER announced the following appointments to fill vacancies:

WILLIAM H. FORNEY, of Alabama, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

R. W. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. PHILLIPS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print as part of the debate certain remarks on correspondence relating to surveys under the War Department. [See Appendix.]

LATE JULIAN HARTRIDGE.

Mr. COOK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to include in the sundry civil appropriation bill a sum sufficient to pay to the widow of the late Julian Hartridge, Representative from the State of Georgia, the amount he would have received for the remainder of the term for which he was elected.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RESTRICTION OF CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Education and Labor to report back a bill (H. R. No. 2423) to restrict the immigration of Chinese to the United States with certain amendments, and to move that the bill and amendments, together with the accompanying report, be printed and recommitted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky. I am also instructed to ask permission for that committee to report the bill on the 28th of this month, after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. CONGER. That is, with the usual condition that it is not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for permission to report it back on the 28th.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will that be made subject to other special orders?

The SPEAKER. Of course they will report on that day. It is a special order for that day, and that day only.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the House I have been absent since Thursday last until to-day as one of the committee which accompanied the remains of Mr. Hartridge to Savannah, Georgia. During my absence, on Friday last, I understand a vote was taken on the William and Mary college bill. Had I been present, I would have voted "no."

And then, on motion of Mr. GARFIELD, (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 15, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WITHERS presented the resolutions of a public meeting of citizens of Powhatan County, Virginia, protesting against the injustice of the tobacco tax; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of a committee of the Public Health Association, appointed at its late meeting in Richmond, Virginia, in favor of such legislation as will secure national sanitary results; which was referred to the select committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases.

Mr. BOOTH presented the petition of James Powell, of San Francisco, praying for such legislation by Congress as will enable him to present and prove his claim for damages caused by the capture of the whaling-ship Edward Cary by the rebel cruiser Shenandoah during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a petition signed by a large number of soldiers whose regiments and companies are given, praying for legislation touching their bounties. This does not relate to the arrears of pension bill, but prays for special legislation in special cases. I ask its reference to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. It should go to the Committee on Military Affairs if it relates to bounty.

Mr. CONKLING. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions says it belongs rather to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I ask that it take that direction.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the memorial of Samuel G. Wolcott, of Oneida County, New York, who represents himself as one of the bona fide purchasers of land through bonds issued for the Des Moines River improvement in Iowa, and remonstrating against the passage of a bill now on the Calendar of the Senate, which professes to quiet the title to those lands. I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of W. E. Webster and a large number of others, soldiers resident in Auburn, Cayuga County, New York, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Van Ness Brothers and a number of others, merchants and shippers in the city of New York, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce, and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Mary L. Turner, widow of Sidney S. Turner, deceased, of Westborough, Massachusetts, praying for the extension of letters-patent granted to her late husband for an improvement in the wax-thread sewing-machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of Abigail F. Voter and 101 other women, of New Vineyard, Maine, praying for the passage of a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, except for medical, medicinal, and scientific purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

COURTS IN COLORADO.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 763) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts in the district of Colorado, which passed the Senate at the last session and was sent to the House and was returned with an amendment and again referred to that committee, to report it with a recommendation that the amendment of the House of Representatives be disagreed to. I think, as I see the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is not here, that I had better, although I am not authorized by the committee to do so, move also that the Senate ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, as that will keep the matter in hand where it can be taken up and disposed of. I make that motion, that the Senate disagree to the House amendment and ask a conference thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be entered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5315) to restore the records and files in the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas, lately destroyed by fire, to report it with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and insert what the committee report, and also an amendment to the title to conform to the amendment. The nature of the amendment simply is to make a general provision of law for restoring records and files that are lost instead of this special one for the State of Texas. I ask to have it printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. McDONALD. To the Committee on Public Lands was referred the memorial of William McGarrahan, praying the correction of a clerical error in the record of a patent to the land grant known as the Rancho Panoche Grande, in California. That committee at the last session of the present Congress reported adversely to the prayer of the memorialist, but asked leave to prepare a more complete report on the subject to be submitted to the Senate. They respectfully submit their report, and I now present it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire it to be read at length?

Mr. McDONALD. I ask to have it printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be printed and laid on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1098) to transfer Paymaster Robert Burton Rodney from the retired list to the active list of the Navy, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SARGENT. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 900) for the relief of Egbert Thompson, to report it adversely, relief having been given in another form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SARGENT. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 356) directing method of annual estimates of expenditures to be submitted from Navy Department, to report it adversely, for the reason that the mode of requiring these estimates seems to be too complicated in their judgment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SARGENT. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 750) to provide for experiments and the purchase of movable torpedoes for military and naval defense, to report it adversely. The appropriation asked for is very large, and the committee thought they would not recommend it at this session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3344) to authorize the appointment of apothecaries as warrant officers in the United States Navy, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of certain seamen serving on the United States steamship Pawnee at Port Royal, South Carolina, praying for an increase of pay and rates, reported adversely thereon, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of G. L. Dyer, master United States Navy, praying to be restored to his proper position on the Naval Register in the line of promotion, reported adversely thereon, and the committee were discharged from its further consideration.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Hugo Osterhaus, United States Navy, asking that Master W. M. Wood, United States Navy, be restored to his proper rank, next after W. P. Ray, master United States Navy, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. What action was had upon that by the committee?

Mr. SARGENT. It is reported adversely. The Senate disposed of the matter in another form, as the Senator from Missouri may be aware, at the last session, which makes this action proper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry Erben, United States Navy, praying to be allowed to appear before the proper naval board of officers for examination for promotion, reported adversely thereon, and the committee were discharged from its further consideration.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of H. O. Rittenhouse, master United States Navy, praying to be advanced to his proper rank in the Navy, reported adversely thereon, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3186) for the relief of the Commercial Bank of Knoxville, Tennessee, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1621) to establish the judicial district of the Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1622) appropriating money for payment of bounty to officers and men of Flag-Officer Farragut's fleet; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1623) authorizing the retirement of Brevet Major-General William W. Averill, United States Army, with the rank and pay of a brigadier-general; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1624) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase land adjacent to the custom-house in the city of Providence, Rhode Island; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GROVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1625) to remove the political disabilities of William T. Welcker, of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1626) providing for the payment of certain obligations of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DORSEY. I present several communications to accompany the bill, which I move be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1627) making appropriation for the purchase of Fort Clark, Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1628) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Erwin;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. By request, and not understanding in full its merits, I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution for reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 47) touching assessments of property in the District of Columbia; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let it be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That no sale of any property for revised assessments shall be advertised until each citizen, or his agent, shall have received the revised statement and shall have an opportunity to have all proper credit for work done under "permit" credited upon said bills and all errors committed by the board of audit corrected, after which thirty days' notice shall be given to come forward and pay said balances, and wherever work has been done by the citizen himself, by permit or otherwise, the same shall be a credit upon his bill; that no brick walls, stone steps, nor coping wall shall be charged in the assessment bills against private property outside the building line, but shall be charged to the general fund, and no grading unless done immediately in front of said premises.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes herein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

MEMORIAL SERVICES TO PROFESSOR HENRY.

Mr. WITHERS. I offer the following resolution and ask that it lie on the table until to-morrow, when I shall call it up:

Resolved, That the Senate will now take a recess until 7.45 p. m., at which time they will meet in this Chamber and proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to participate in the ceremonies commemorative of the life and services of Professor Henry, late Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

CHEYENNE INDIANS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the circumstances which led to the recent escape of the Cheyenne Indians from Fort Robinson, and their subsequent slaughter by the United States forces who were charged with their custody; and that said committee report its findings to this body.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that I object to the inquiry, but I do not see how the committee can obtain any additional information unless some power is given to it other than that which is provided in the resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. I know nothing about that; I only know, in view of statements that are appearing in the press, attributed to officers of the highest character in the Army, the affair ought to be investigated for our own credit and for the credit of the country.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will hear me one moment——

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I will say to him that his resolution is all-sufficient for the present. If the committee find that they want more power they can ask for more power. This initiates the inquiry, and I think too it would be very well that the inquiry should be made.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wish to say to the Senators favoring this resolution, that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has made a full report of his version of this matter, and there are reports in the War Department from the military officers. If the inquiry is to go beyond those two things, which are accessible of course at any time by a call for information, some additional power must be given to the committee. I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will only say in response that this matter will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs by the resolution, and if they are not satisfied with the information that is here and desire to obtain more, and think more ought to be obtained, they can ask for further powers to obtain it.

The resolution was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask leave to make a report from the committee of conference on the Military Academy appropriation bill. It may not be necessary to read the report in full. There are only one or two subjects of conference, and the differences have been divided. I ask that the report be concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear what it is.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 9, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$900;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$3,100;" and the Senate agree to the same.

W. B. ALLISON,
H. G. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
M. J. DURHAM,
A. HERR SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator having the report in charge would be kind enough to explain exactly what all this means, so that we can understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will explain the report briefly. The first amendment inserted by the Senate provided for increasing the compensation to two professors on the ground that the First Comptroller of the Treasury had decided that they were entitled to compensation as colonels rather than as lieutenant-colonels, under a section of the Revised Statutes; but, inasmuch as that decision is in conflict with the estimates made by the Department the House insisted that we should appropriate according to the estimates, and we have so appropriated the present year.

The next point relates to a clerk of the treasurer at the academy. We inserted an amendment authorizing the treasurer to appoint a clerk at a salary of $1,200 a year. The other House agree to the clerk, but provide a salary of $900 instead of $1,200, to which the Senate conferees have assented.

The Senate also inserted an appropriation of $3,000 to provide electrical apparatus for making experiments in electricity. The House thought that was too much and agreed to the insertion of $1,500, which we have accepted.

I believe those are all the items included in the report.

The report was concurred in.

DISTRICT WATER RATES.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1529.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let it be read for information.

The bill (S. No. 1529) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to adjust and fix the water rates within said District was read by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. This bill will excite some discussion, I suppose, and I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that we utilize the remainder of the morning hour by proceeding to the consideration of unobjected cases on the Calendar under the resolution that was passed yesterday for next Friday.

Mr. DORSEY. It is very important that this bill should be passed at the earliest day practicable, so that it may go to the House and become a law at the present session of Congress. It is represented by the District commissioners that the tax received from the water register now is wholly inadequate to pay the expenses of the department and the interest upon the water debt. I believe that under the present law the manner of levying the tax is simply absurd. The tax now is assessed according to the front of the lot upon the street, without any regard whatever to the amount of water used, the number of faucets in the house, or the size of the house generally. Of course one man may use one hundred times as much water in his dwelling as his neighbor and not pay half as much for it. I shall be very glad if the bill can be acted upon now. It is a very short one, and I doubt whether it will lead to discussion.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia how long the present law has been in force?

Mr. DORSEY. I think since the establishment of the water-works.

Mr. KERNAN. That was away back in 1869?

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. I hope that bill will lie over unless the Senator can answer me a question. I happen to live temporarily in a portion of the city where the neighbors all around me say they can get no water at all. Is there any provision made in the bill to supply them with water if they are to be taxed for it? Unless the Senator can answer that question I wish the bill to lie on the table for the present, for the people living on the hill object very much to an increase of tax for water which goes to the benefit of a few people in a particular neighborhood, and excludes, as is now practically done, all the people living in that part of the city from getting any water at all, although they pay as much tax as those who have an abundant supply of water. If the Senator cannot answer that question, I should like to look at the bill, and for that purpose have it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. DORSEY. This bill is intended to meet the objection which the Senator from Kentucky raises, and which I know to be a real objection. In a letter which I hold in my hand from the commissioners they say that "from the want of means the commissioners are now unable to lay a section of twelve-inch pipe, at a cost of $7,500, which would materially improve the supply of water upon the high grounds of Capitol Hill," where I think there is no supply at all in many of the houses, and the commissioners have no money with which to lay the mains to convey the water to the points necessary.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say, and my information is very vague I admit, that one of the great difficulties is that they have what is called a stand-pipe, drawing the water away from the hill to the navy-yard for Government operations; and but for this stand-pipe drawing it away they could get water; but as long as it remains they cannot get any. I desire that those people may have water; that is all.

Mr. DORSEY. I understand that last year we erected a stand-pipe at a very large expense, and now the commissioners are without money to convey the water from that stand-pipe to the part of the city intended to be benefited by it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas whether there is a printed report or any information by which the Senate can act upon this matter intelligently. This is a subject that needs some consideration, I have no doubt; but it must be borne in mind, as the Senator from Arkansas has just stated, that since 1869 the system has remained just as it is now. That being the case, and no petition having been presented here, there must be some special reason why we should move in the matter just at this time.

Again, my impression is that this matter should be well considered before the Senate takes final action upon it. I do not know how long or how thoroughly the Senator or his committee may have considered the subject, but it is one that needs attention.

Mr. DORSEY. I hold in my hand a report of the water commissioner of the District, and also a letter from the District commissioners, explaining in detail the reasons why this bill ought to pass. If the bill is taken up, of course I shall send these documents to the desk to be read.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will have printed in the RECORD the information which he thinks we ought to have in reference to the bill. In that case I shall endeavor to get all the information possible in the course of to-night or in the morning and aid him in bringing up the bill in the morning after having an opportunity to read the documents to which he has referred. I should not like to be required to vote upon the bill now.

Mr. DORSEY. Then I ask leave to present the documents and to have them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ANTHONY. They had better be printed for distribution to Senators in the usual way, and not be printed in the RECORD. Such a course cumbers the RECORD with a great deal of unnecessary matter.

Mr. DORSEY. The papers are very short.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island, and think the papers ought to be printed in the usual manner.

Mr. DORSEY. They are very short communications. I have no choice as to the mode in which they are printed, whether in the RECORD or otherwise.

Mr. BECK. Is there objection to their being printed in the RECORD?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The matter of expense is all the objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The papers will be printed, and the bill will go over, subject to the call of the Senator from Arkansas.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 986) for the relief of William S. Morris, William S. Mann, Charles A. Oakman, George W. Hillman, the Union Transfer Company, all of Philadelphia, the Union Transfer Company of Baltimore, Maryland, and John R. Graham, late of Philadelphia, now of Washington, District of Columbia.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed during the residue of the morning hour to the consideration of unobjected cases on the Calendar, under the rule adopted yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island? The Chair hears none, and the Calendar will be called under the resolution adopted yesterday. The Secretary will report the bills on the Calendar in their order.

The first business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) authorizing Captain Jonathan Young, of the United States Navy, to accept a betel-nut box and silver medal from the Emperor of Siam.

Mr. SARGENT. I object to that joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 263) to provide for a survey of an inland water-route and canal from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that lie over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is objected to, and the next bill will be reported.

EXTRA PAY TO SOLDIERS OF MEXICAN WAR.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 376) for the payment to the officers and soldiers of the Mexican war of the three months' extra pay provided for by the act of July 19, 1848. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the officers and soldiers "engaged in the military service of the United States in the war with Mexico, and who served out the time of their engagement or were honorably discharged," the three months' extra pay provided for by the act of July 19, 1848, and the limitations contained in that act, in all cases, upon the presentation of satisfactory evidence that such extra compensation has not been previously received.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to insert at the end the following proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall include also the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines of the United States Navy employed in the prosecution of said war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. MAXEY January 22, 1878:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 376) entitled "An act for payment to the officers and soldiers of the Mexican war," &c., have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The act of July 19, 1848, which House bill No. 376 seeks to revive, was "repealed" by the act of July 12, 1870. (Sections 4, 5, chapter 251, volume 16, Statutes at Large, pages 250, 251.) According to the construction of that law by the accounting officers of the Treasury—though it will be observed that neither the act of July 19, 1848, granting extra pay to the men of the Army, nor the act of August 31, 1852, (chapter 109, volume 10, page 100,) granting extra pay to persons in the naval service on the coasts of Mexico and California (the same as had been allowed to the Army serving in California, see chapter 78, 1850, volume 9, pages 504, 505,) are specifically mentioned as being included in the laws repealed by said act of July 12, 1870.

A proviso to House bill No. 376, on line 12, after the words "received," to wit—

"Provided, That the provisions of said act shall include also the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines of the United States Navy employed in the prosecution of said war"— would perhaps be just and proper.

The debate in the House (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 19 instant) when the bill passed, will give some light on the subject.

The same bill passed the House June 30, 1876, and some remarks were made by Mr. RIDDLE and others on the merits of the case. (See RECORD, July 1, 1876.)

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill, amended by the proviso.

Mr. WITHERS. I desire to offer an amendment adding the words "the revenue service."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first question is on the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the amendment of the committee reported again.

The amendment was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment recommended by the committee by adding after the word "war," in the last line, the words "and the war for the suppression of the rebellion."

Mr. WITHERS. I should like to ask how that would follow? It is not germane to the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is very germane myself.

Mr. WITHERS. Let the amendment of the committee be reported as it is proposed to be amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported.

The SECRETARY. The proviso as proposed to be amended would read:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall include also the officers, petty officers, seamen, and marines of the United States Navy employed in the prosecution of said war and the war for the suppression of the rebellion.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me if the amendment is applied to seamen who were employed in the war of the rebellion, it ought also to be applied to soldiers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it ought, but this is the proviso of the committee. When we come to the body of the bill, we can endeavor to fix that.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill now under consideration came to the Senate from the House and was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was acted on by that committee and reported favorably to this body. On a former occasion the bill was called up for consideration, under what was known as the Anthony rule, and some discussion then took place upon it. Being myself in charge of the bill, at the request of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] which was in the nature of an objection, the bill was passed over. The RECORD of that date will show the correspondence which led to the presentation of this bill and its passage by the House. The whole purpose and design of the bill is to equalize the three months' extra pay which was granted by legislation many years ago. I had the dates at that time, and by reference to the RECORD they will be seen, together with a reference to the volumes of the United States Statutes at Large. The whole purpose, as I say, is to equalize the three months' extra pay among all those who served in the Mexican war. The Secretary of War at that time construed the law to be that the three months' extra pay applied only to volunteers and did not apply to those in the regular Army. It was deemed by the committee, and I think it equitable and just, that all those who served their country in Mexico, a foreign country, should be equally entitled to this gratuity on the part of the Government; and therefore the provisions of the law should be extended to those who served in the Army of the United States equally. It was considered, and I think properly, that those who were in the marine service (and there were officers and soldiers in the marine service in Mexico) and who did active service there should be included, and so the bill was amended by the committee so as to include in like manner those of the Navy who served in the Mexican war.

The whole design and scope of the bill was simply to place those who had not received their three months' extra pay upon an equal footing with those who had and who had done no other or better service than those who did not receive it. That is all there is of it. I do not myself believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont is germane to the bill or could properly be attached to it as part of the measure, because the bill relates only to one war—the Mexican war—and it has no reference whatever to the late war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the officers and soldiers and sailors of the last war had provisions made for them that have not been carried out; and therefore, if we are going to undertake to readjust questions of bounty and extra pay, and so forth, for the soldiers of the Mexican war, let us do it for the soldiers of a war quite as important as that.

Now as to the bill itself, I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Texas if there is any official report in the possession of the Senate from the War Department or any other Department, which sets forth exactly what this three months' extra pay was, what the extent and application of the three months' extra pay alluded to in the bill, provided for by the act of July 19, 1848, was; how many have received it; how many have not received it, and how it happens that those who were entitled to it by the law and did not receive it, failed to receive it?

Mr. MAXEY. A correspondence was opened up by the Committee on Military Affairs with a view of arriving at the record referred to by the Senator from Vermont. A communication was presented from the Paymaster-General in that regard. It seems that the matter was referred to the Paymaster-General, through an auditor, for final settlement of those matters. Accompanying that came an official copy of a letter from Secretary Marcy, which the Senator may perhaps recollect; he read it at the time. All those papers were before the Senate at the time this matter came under discussion, and the Senator objected at the last session of Congress. I thought I could lay my hand upon the papers, but I had no thought that the bill was coming up this morning, and I have not got them now. Those papers showed the construction placed by Secretary Marcy on the act. The Senator examined them at the time, and the RECORD will show that he said to the Senate that he believed the Secretary was correct in his construction. Secretary Marcy construed that the legislation did not grant three months' extra pay to those in the Regular Army of the United States.

The object of this bill, as I stated before, is to place them on terms of equality with others, and let in all who have not heretofore received their pay—officers of the Army, Navy, and marines, and all soldiers who have not been paid this three months' extra pay—on the same footing as volunteers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am so unfortunate as not to be able, even with the clear explanation of the Senator from Texas, to understand precisely what the state of the law was in 1848 here referred to, and precisely what has occurred, and what were the difficulties or misconstructions then that led to anybody being debarred from his extra pay who by that act was entitled to it. Now if we have in the files of the Senate or anywhere else official information which shows exactly what that was, I shall be glad to see it. Are there any papers?

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator that I had those papers on the previous discussion. If I had the RECORD of the former debate, that would show the whole of them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be that they are in the files of the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator took part in that debate, and the whole of it came out there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it has entirely gone out of my mind; I do not remember anything about it.

The Senator from Texas speaks of this bill being intended to apply only, if I correctly understand him, to the officers and soldiers of the regular Army and the regular Navy of the United States. The bill does not say so. It speaks of all officers and soldiers engaged in the military service of the country in the Mexican war.

Mr. MAXEY. I stated that there were quite a number of persons who were entitled as volunteers to that three months' extra pay who had not drawn it; but under a statute which passed some time in 1870 or 1871 all these claims were barred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How barred?

Mr. MAXEY. An act passed which prohibited payment of any further claims under this previous legislation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can the Senator refer me to that act?

Mr. MAXEY. I have sent for the RECORD. That will show the whole of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not remember any such act.

Mr. MAXEY. I have not got all the papers at my desk. The RECORD will show them, and I have sent for it. I made a minute of it at the time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can the Senator give me the title of the act of 1870 to which he refers, or the subject of it?

Mr. CONKLING. If I do not interrupt the Senator from Vermont in the midst of a sentence, I will make an observation about this matter while he is looking at the bopks.

It seems to me without the amendment of the Senator from Vermont this bill is involved in so much difficulty that I venture to suggest to the Senator from Texas it is hardly worth while to attempt to dispose of it in this morning hour.

The bill provides that certain persons described shall receive the pay allotted to certain other persons in an act referred to. I have that act before me, and, unless I have omitted something in reading it over two or three times, there is no provision in the act sustaining this reference. The only section applicable to it that I can find concludes in this way:

Or who died in service, or who having been honorably discharged have since died, or may hereafter die, without receiving the three months' pay herein provided for, shall be entitled to receive three months' extra pay.

Now, there is no "pay herein provided for" unless a provision shall be found in some one of the acts here referred to, which acts are not quoted or referred to except by their date. So I suggest to the honorable Senator from Texas that perhaps he will want on review to make this bill more explicit as to the provision to which it really does refer, this provision which I have read being as it seems to me inadequate to the purpose of the bill.

Then, to confuse still more the confusion that may be found, comes in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, which it will be perceived provides that the sailors of the late war—confining it to the present amendment—shall receive the three months' extra pay which was provided in an act approved on the 19th of July, 1848. Well, that was inconveniently before the war for the suppression of the rebellion; and it so happened that all the acts which existed then fixed a rate of pay by the month for soldiers and sailors quite different from the rate applicable to the war of the rebellion. So that with the amendment we should have here a sort of compound comminutive confusion, and I think that the Senator from Texas perhaps had better let this bill lie over until he finds his memorandum and is able to refer to the act to which he means to refer more fully, so that we may all understand it alike.

Mr. MAXEY. I think the suggestion of the Senator from New York is correct. I will simply state that I did not call up this bill this morning. I supposed it would be reached on Friday under the order adopted yesterday, and I expected to be prepared on Friday to submit it to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the order adopted upon the suggestion of the Senator from New York, the bill will go over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to say one word before it goes over if there be no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I withdraw the suggestion so that the Senator may be heard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My amendment was drawn on the idea that this bill that it is proposed to pass into a law, in legal effect actually provides for giving three months' extra pay to the soldiers of the Mexican war when the present law, the law of 1848, did not give it to them. My amendment, therefore, was intended, if we are to give a bounty of three months' extra pay to the soldiers of the Mexican war, good, bad, and indifferent, to provide that we shall give a bounty of three months' extra pay to the soldiers and sailors in the war for the suppression of the rebellion. I think it will turn out when you come to examine the act of 1848 and the history of it, that the soldiers and sailors are to get this money, not because the act of 1848 provided it for them, but because this bill provides it for them; and so I say if this bill is to provide three months' extra pay for the soldiers of the Mexican war, then it ought to provide three months' extra pay for the soldiers in the war of the rebellion.

Mr. MAXEY. I have now the debate that I referred to, which is in the RECORD of April 18, 1878, and which shows precisely what was said then when the matter was entirely fresh, not only by the Senator from Vermont but by myself. It is all here and all the acts are referred to and given.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the bill goes over, I will take that RECORD and look at it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over. The Secretary will report the next bill.

NATIONAL OBSERVATORY.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) authorizing the appointment of a commission of scientists to investigate and report upon the establishment and location of an additional national observatory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That has never been referred, has it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been referred.

Mr. PADDOCK. It may lie over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

WILLIAM B. WHITING.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 647) granting a pension to William B. Whiting.

Mr. SARGENT. Unless the committee are ready to have that bill indefinitely postponed, I ask that it go over.

Mr. WITHERS. I should be glad to have it take effect.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

LAURENA C. P. HASKINS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 413) to increase the pension of Laurena C. P. Haskins, which was reported adversely from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made if there be no objection.

THE MILITIA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 104) amending section 1661, title 16, (The Militia,) of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of one o'clock has arrived. The Senate will proceed with the consideration of its unfinished business.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 360) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MATTHEWS to the second section.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If it be in order now, there being another amendment pending presented by the Senator from Ohio, I have his consent to move to make a verbal amendment in the fourth line of section 2, to remove the verbal ambiguity which he pointed out when he addressed the Senate yesterday. That is, to add after the word "pronounced," in line 4, the words "as well as in all such suits hereafter instituted." That will remove the ambiguity.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to this amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to. The question now is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS,] which will be read.

The SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is, in section 2, line 10, to strike out all after the word "cases," where it first occurs, down to and including the word "awarded," in line 23; in line 27, to strike out all after the word "case," down to and including the word "recovery," in line 29; to strike out lines 36, 37, 38, 39, down to and including the word "aforesaid," in line 40, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

No account of profits or savings shall in any case be allowed; but evidence thereof may be admitted as tending to prove what shall be deemed a reasonable license fee as compensation for the infringement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on this amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WITHERS. I understand there are several amendments offered. Is it proposed to take the vote on all of them collectively?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It is necessary to take the question on the whole amendment of the Senator from Ohio. It embraces one subject.

Mr. MATTHEWS. It is all one amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know, in the first place, whether this amendment—which I could not understand from the reading—is an amendment to the text of the bill, in section 2; or is it an amendment to the amendments of the committee?

Mr. MATTHEWS. It is an amendment to the text of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to mean by this amendment that in case of an infringement of a patent, and a recovery and establishment of that patent in a court of equity, no account of profits is to be taken, but that the whole measure of redress shall be a license fee?

Mr. MATTHEWS. The precise effect of the amendment, if adopted, would be first to make the rule and measure of damages in equity and at law the same, and then to make that rule what shall be considered a fair compensation for the loss to the plaintiff by way of damages for the injury which he complains of, excluding any computation or account of either profits or savings as such a measure of damages, but allowing evidence of them as tending to prove what the damages consist of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I heard it read, I understand that the license fee is the test of how much the party is to recover, "what would be a fair license fee," according to the reading from the desk; and if that is the sole rule in a matter where the Constitution recognizes such property, if Congress chooses to do so, as being an exclusive right to its use, if anybody may invade this exclusive right which the Constitution speaks of, and may pay the average license fee, then you have disposed of the whole value of your patent laws. If you are to say to the owner of a patent that he shall not have any exclusive use of it, but everybody is free to infringe it at the only risk of paying the ordinary license fee for use and occupation, then you had better say in terms that everybody shall be at liberty to invade a patent, whether by accident or by design and have absolute freedom of use, and that the owner shall collect of the party who uses it what a jury would say is a fair sum for use and occupation; that is, what he would have been willing, if he had wanted to rent it out, to take as a fair compensation for the use of his machine or the right to make it.

It appears to me that such an amendment would overthrow the whole patent system and the whole value of the patent system.

Mr. HOAR. You have an injunction left.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have an injunction left, but it is too late usually.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. With an amendment which might be made at the end of this section, and which I presume, if this amendment shall be adopted, the committee will accept, though I am not authorized to speak for it, I should be in favor of this amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio unless the Committee on Patents object to it. They have given a great deal of consideration to this subject; they have had all the various interests in the country represented, both those of patentees and those of alleged infringers, and have spent a great deal of time getting up a bill to harmonize all interests and the views of all parties. I am therefore very loath myself to offer any amendment to the work of the committee; but there is one class of cases in which it seems to me justice requires that the patentee should be allowed to recover profits, and but one class, and that class is where the invention from its very nature is such that it would be for the interests of the patentee to retain the entire monopoly of his patent; such, for instance, as Mr. Edison's telephone. If he chose to retain the entire monopoly of the manufacture of that instrument I can see no good reason why any man who should violate that patent should not respond in profits, why he should not pay all the profits which he might make from the manufacture or sale. There the profits would in justice and equity measure a fair compensation, and it is only in that class of cases that profits do measure a fair compensation.

In the class of cases to which I have alluded profits constitute a proper measure of a fair compensation for the injury done to the patentee. Why? Because but for the act of the defendant the owner of the patent might have made the same. But in most patents, in ninety-nine out of one hundred at least, and probably a larger proportion, it is for the interest of the patentee that others should use his invention and should pay him a royalty or a license fee, and therefore, in all that large class of cases I see no reason for allowing any profits at all as profits. The evidence of profits, however, I think, ought to be allowed to be given as one of the items to show what would be a proper measure of damages as it tends to show what is the value of the patent which has been infringed. It would be one of the elements to show what would constitute a proper license fee.

But as to the first class of cases which I have mentioned, I confess that I have great difficulty in voting for the bill without a provision allowing profits to be recovered; that is, where it is for the interest of the patentee to retain his monopoly. It is an exclusive right, and it does seem to me that we are taking a very high position when we undertake to say that he shall sell it at whatever a jury may assess it to be worth when it would clearly be for his interest not to sell it at all, and therefore, if I could have my own way in reference to this bill—for I am discussing it in rather a discursive manner—I would adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, and then add an amendment taking out of the operation of this section the first class of cases which I alluded to, and I propose that now to the committee. The measure is one for which they are responsible more than I. I only make this as a suggestion, and I am very unwilling to antagonize the committee in anything pertaining to a bill over which they have spent so much time, and to which they have given so much consideration.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio abolishes any account for profits in all cases. It seems to me that the remarks of my friend the Senator from Michigan upon that point are correct: that it would be unjust to the patentee to abolish profits in all cases, because in some cases he may wish to have the exclusive use of his invention. Take, for instance, a pin-machine by which the patentee may be able to manufacture pins to supply the whole market. It is for his interest that there should be no use of it by others, and under the theory of the Constitution, and under the law, he has the right to manufacture pins for the market himself, and to allow no one else to do so under his patent. It seems to me that in such a case as that—and there are many cases of that kind—to compel him to sell his invention at such a price as any jury may say he ought to have for it is a violation of the exclusive right granted to him by the Constitution and the law.

Now, Mr. President, this bill has been the result of very much care and deliberation on the part of the committee. There have appeared before the committee all parties interested in patents. The bill, to a certain extent, is a compromise between those conflicting interests. To amend it materially and vitally, as this amendment proposes to do, will affect to a great extent the interests of people who have not been heard upon any question of this kind. I think that before any material amendment of the patent laws is adopted that amendment should be discussed, the parties who are to be affected by it should be heard before Congress; and for that reason, if for no other, I should be compelled to oppose the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, because no man came before the committee and proposed to abolish profits entirely, no one asks for that; and the Senator from Ohio in his opposition to this bill asks what no person asked, so far as I know, before the Committee on Patents, and he asks it, too, upon grounds which seem to me—and I say it with all due deference to him—to be absurd. One of these grounds is that the appointment of an auditor to take an account in a matter which no jury can possibly understand is unconstitutional, a violation of the constitutional right of trial by jury.

Why, Mr. President, in the New England States auditors have been appointed from time immemorial under laws like this. All complicated accounts go to an auditor appointed by the court. He examines them, and no jury could properly examine them. He makes a report upon them, and that report being adopted by the court goes before the jury as prima facie evidence of that account. The question of the constitutionality of such laws has again and again been brought before the courts of those States, and they have been decided to be constitutional. There is not a decision opposed to them in the United States that I am aware of. Are we to presume that the courts of the United States, against the decisions of all those courts which have considered similar questions, are to decide that such a law is unconstitutional?

Mr. President, it being vastly for the advantage of courts and for the advantage of justice that matters of this kind which cannot possibly be understood by a jury should in the first place be sent to an auditor, I prefer to leave that question in this law to the courts of the United States. If this is an unconstitutional provision let them so decide. But inasmuch as whenever the question has arisen before the State courts the State courts have decided such laws to be constitutional, I prefer to treat such laws as constitutional until the Supreme Court of the United States shall have decided the question.

Then, too, it is said that any fixing of the measurement of damages is unheard of. Why, Mr. President, if the fixing of the measure of damages is not unjust, nobody has a right to complain; it is in violation of nobody's rights. The Senator from Ohio makes no complaint that the measurement of damages is unjust to anybody, as I understand.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I did make that specific objection, that it was not the rightful measure of damages. I shall endeavor to explain it when the Senator concludes.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Then I will speak upon that question. The bill simply provides that an account of profits shall be taken in a case where the infringer manufactures and sells the machine itself or sells the product thereof. In such cases there is no difficulty or but very little difficulty in fixing the amount of profit which the party has received. That profit he has made from the property of the plaintiff. In most cases it would be the true measure of damages. So it seems to me, and so it appeared to the committee.

But I do not desire to multiply words upon this bill. As I have said before, the bill has been before the committee for a long time; the whole matter has been the subject of earnest consideration on the part of the committee, a full consideration; and all interests have appeared before the committee. As I said before, nobody proposed to go so far as the Senator from Ohio now proposes.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator let me ask him a question and make a remark?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator aims, I think, a serious blow at the pending amendment when he says that it affects interests which have never been heard before the committee or here. I want to inquire whether it is not true that, dismissing the amendment and taking the bill as it would stand without it, interests are then affected which have never been heard? For example, have all the men or all the interests been heard which are to be not only affected, but, as I understand it, altogether denied by this second section? I mean, among others, those whose inventions have been employed without profit ascertained by sales, but merely as elements of economy, of saving in processes. I mean those whose inventions have been adopted by extensive mill-owners, by corporations manufacturing goods, fabrics of various sorts, by railway companies, and by others who, utilizing the invention in the manufacture of apparatus and implements which they construct themselves, have saved very largely, but who, as I cannot help understanding this section, are given virtual impunity against all inventors. Now, I inquire whether all the men or all the interests thus to be affected were heard before the committee, and if it was after a hearing in behalf of those interests that the committee has proposed a section, which, it seems to me,—I may be mistaken about that, the Senator is much more intelligent about it,—leaves them remediless?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The bill thus affecting those who claim to have savings allowed as profits was printed more than a year ago. Five thousand copies of it were printed for distribution. Those copies have been furnished to every patentee or every user of a patent who desired one. The arguments before the committee upon this very point have been circulated broadcast among those interested in patents; and the question as to whether savings should be considered as profits and the abuses growing out of that rule have been fully considered by the committee, and everybody who was interested in having savings thus treated has had an opportunity to be heard, and, so far as I know, has been heard before the committee, if he desired. When my friend, the Senator from New York, asks me if every man in the United States who is interested in this matter has been heard, I am forced to answer, probably not.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire whether the view in favor of allowing savings to be computed was not presented to the committee by very able counsel, representing clients who were interested in favor of that view, both orally and by correspondence very fully?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Certainly, and fully considered by the committee, and those parties have had a full opportunity to be heard, and have been heard, so far as I know. And the committee came to the unanimous conclusion that the abuses which grew up under that rule required the adoption of a different one.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator says five thousand copies of this bill were printed and sent broadcast. That explains to me the great number of letters which come daily to me and which have been coming for a long time, not only from patentees and inventors, but from other persons, some of whom I know to be discerning and believe to be just persons, who think that this is a mistake, an experiment which will be regretted, an injustice sure to be experienced if it becomes a law and continues.

The Senator says that having heard, not every man—of course I did not mean to ask such a question, but having heard arguments in behalf of the idea that a man whose machine saves money was entitled to some consideration at least, the committee deemed it necessary to adopt a different rule, and he leaves us to infer that they selected the rule here adopted as the appropriate one to substitute. I venture, then, to ask the Senator to state in brief,—it may have been stated before, but I have not heard it,—the argument which answers a case like this: here is a man who confessedly did invent a useful and a novel thing which you cannot use, which I cannot use, but which can be used only by those conducting special kinds of business on a large scale. They, without license or authority, appropriate it. They carry it as an increment of value and an element of cost, and advantage, into vast quantities of productions which they make and use in their own affairs, selling none of them, for there is no market except to others engaged in like business, and they for themselves respectively manufacture also. Now, when this inventor comes to complain, unless the case happens to be one in which not merely saving, not merely economy, not merely advantage has been achieved by appropriating his invention, but also profit over and above all the gross expenses involved in the business, the answer this law makes to him is, as I understand it, "We know you not; you are an inventor; you are a meritorious inventor; your invention is one exceedingly useful, but it is not applicable to general and promiscuous use; the farmer on his farm, the dairyman in his dairy, the plowman in the field, does not use this invention. If he did, you might have a remedy. It is only used by large aggregated capitalists; they use it, and they make it, and therefore there is no answer for you except that answer which Marshal Ney is said to have made on his return from Moscow when a friend, freezing in the snow, appealed to him by the memory of early friendship to do something for him, and turning his head he said, "You are one of the victims of war," and passed along.

If that be true of this section, as many of these correspondents say it is, I submit to the Senate that in a forum in which justice is sought it is worthy of inquiry, and particularly so when we are dealing with a statute which in all its sections assumes that you have only to transfer the illustration to some man who uses a stove-damper, or a door-latch, or a window-fastener, or some one of the innumerable trifles that enter into the economy of life, and he may be prosecuted, not only the vendor but the purchaser, because there in the manufacture in detail of this article and its sale there are ostensibly profits above the cost of producing it. There the inventor has his remedy after some measure (and the Senator from New Hampshire tells us it is a just measure) for the infringement.

Now, I say that to utter together these two provisions, leveling the severe provision at all the people individually who are buyers and users, and aiming the provision for impunity and immunity at the strong, the powerful, the able, the intelligent, the organized, seems to me to furnish ground for the allegation that there is a two-fold injustice: first, an injustice toward the one class whom I have described; and, second, an aggravation of that injustice because in respect to another class the provisions fail.

I did not mean, Mr. President, certainly at this moment, to say anything about this bill. I wish to vote for the bill if I can, and certainly I do not wish to fail to vote for it if it is likely, if it is very likely, plainly likely to improve the patent system; but I confess I have some hesitation about a leap in the dark, and although I have no doubt the committee has performed conscientiously and carefully its duty, I have not seen until very recently evidence of the fact that the bench or the bar of the country had been sufficiently aroused on this subject to give the aid that they could give and which I must think from communications sent to me they are now in the act of giving in this regard. It is a very old saying that everybody knows more than anybody; and the ablest committee in this body or any other, may sit and listen to attorneys representing one interest and counsel representing somebody else and come to a most conscientious and intelligent conclusion, and still in a matter so complex as this it is more than likely that when the converging rays of a great many minds are turned upon that subject new considerations and new thoughts may be suggested which it is well worth while to utilize.

Now I beg to say again that I did not rise to criticise this bill: but in reading the second section again and again and reading it by the light of complaining communications that come to me, I confess that if I sat to-morrow in my office and a client were to come and consult me about his rights under this section, as I now understand it I should be compelled to make a statement to him which would enable him to put to me a very awkward question, which he would put if he were to say, "why then did you vote for such a law as that?" So that I should be glad in voting for it, for one, to be able to justify it here and to be able to justify it when it comes to be a statute if it shall, and to operate in the cases which it is intended to cover.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, the communications to which my friend, the Senator from New York, refers, are not of modern date. I have been receiving them by bushels, I may say, ever since this bill was introduced into Congress. They and their arguments have been fully considered before the committee, and after considering them, and after hearing these complaints by the bushel, the committee has unanimously decided that this bill should pass. I do not undertake to say that every member of this committee prefers all the provisions of this bill to any provision which he might get up or make; but what I do say is, that the committee has unanimously come to the conclusion that this bill as it stands, if it passes, will be for the interest not only of patentees, but of the public.

Now, what kind of a right is it that is taken away from these suffering patentees? And in that connection I must say that patentees or combinations owning patent-rights are sometimes as powerful as anybody else. There are in this country combinations of capitalists who own large numbers of patents and who do business upon those patents, and they are strong enough under the law as it is now to crush any patentee at their will; and that is one thing which the committee was desirous to get rid of, and I will tell my friend the Senator from New York how and why. Take, for instance, the invention of some improvement in a loom, which is used by a manufacturing company in a factory. It may be a very small invention, but a desirable one, and it goes into general use. Looms are made embodying that invention. The manufacturers who buy these looms know nothing about the invention; they cannot know anything about it. They do not suppose they are infringing anybody's right; but they buy these looms with this little invention, which is perhaps imperceptible to anybody who is not particularly skilled in patent-rights, and who has not examined the whole subject. They put the looms into their mill and operate the improvement in their looms. Under the law as it is now, after fifteen or sixteen or seventeen years, along comes a gigantic combination or company owning numerous patents, of which this is one, and it calls upon the manufacturing company for what? For damages? Oh, no, not at all; but that it shall account for the profits it has made by that invention during that whole time. They demand an account of profits. Consequently this corporation, this mill company, this manufacturing company has to go into all its books, go over all its accounts for those years, ascertain how much profit has been made each year, and at the end of all they have a computation that may last months or years to find out how large a part of all they have made for seventeen years is due to that little thing in the loom. Of course everybody knows that no one can find it out; it is a matter of guess after all; but under the law as it is now that goes into the account of profits in many cases. Now, what I say is that if that patent is in the hands of a powerful combination, that power which they have enables them to crush their adversary. What manufacturing company would not pay almost any amount rather than be subjected to an inquisition of that kind? Who can tell what the result is to be?

Mr. President, the results of this rule have been as absurd as might be expected. Take the swedge-block cases, where it was proved that the machine was of no use whatever, because after all had been done by it that could be done, it did not produce a result that was profitable. The rails which had been operated by it were not worth enough more after the operation to pay the cost of the operation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why did they resort to the operation, then?

Mr. WADLEIGH. They did not know anything about the patent; that is, they did not know who were the parties who claimed it. It was claimed that they must account for the difference in cost between doing that by hand and doing it by that machine, and a decree was entered against them for $1,700,000 for what was of no value whatever. The court finally arbitrarily reduced it to $400,000, which was enormously unjust and oppressive.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator is mistaken as to the swedge-block cases. This was a process, a mode of mending exfoliated rails, protected by a patent. The old manner of doing it was by hammer, and the rule adopted was how much the railroad company saved between that old mode and the mode which was invented by Turrill. That was it; nothing else. It was susceptible of positive demonstration, there was no guessing about it at all, that the company had done this; but it was too much, of course; it was too large an amount. That, however, was the rule adopted.

Mr. WADLEIGH. In that case there was no guessing. My friend, the Senator from Illinois, is right. The court said that the defendants must pay just what had been saved between the cost of doing what they had done by hammer or by hand and doing it by that machine, when the truth was that what they had done was of no benefit to them whatever. The rails might better have been left as they were; they had better have cut off the rails and thrown away the ends.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. They discovered that after they had used the process of Turrill for years and would not pay him anything. Then they discovered that by a new process they could do it a great deal cheaper.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask a question in that connection?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the honorable Senator from New Hampshire to commend these provisions now because they protect manufacturers from what he calls an inquisition, and he asks what would not a manufacturing company rather pay than submit its books and accounts to be pried into. Feeling the force of that, I call attention to the section at line 36——

Mr. WADLEIGH. I did not intend to make that the main point against this system at all.

Mr. CONKLING. I was so much impressed by it myself that I thought it was a capital point in the Senator's argument. I feel the force of it very much, and I speak seriously.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The terrors of that inquisition were as nothing compared to the decrees which might follow it and compared to the amounts which might be wrung from parties for the use of inventions nearly or absolutely worthless.

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator disparages his own point and treats unkindly his own offspring; and I repeat it struck me with a great deal of force when he said that there were grave objections to investigating all the accounts of manufacturing corporations. Therefore I was about to bring to his attention a provision of the bill that the committee proposes and to ask him what was the view of the committee at that moment in this regard:

> No account of savings shall in any case be allowed; and no evidence or account of the defendant's profits shall in any case be admitted, except as to actual profits resulting from making for sale or selling the thing patented, or the product thereof as aforesaid.

And I inquire whether it is more onerous for a corporation to submit to an inquiry how much it has saved in its operations than to submit to an inquisition of all its books and accounts provided the case is one in which it appears that it has made a profit? Why is it that those who have made a profit out of "the product thereof as aforesaid" should be subjected to an inquisition any more than the people who have done the same thing but realized their profit by the saving which has nourished and made profitable the other branches of their business?

I thought, if the Senator will pardon me a moment further, that one of the greatest objections to the income tax was the very thing at which he now levels his remark, the prying, snuffing inquisition to which it subjected the private affairs of persons, natural and artificial; and therefore as I said and said seriously, his remark in that respect struck me. But when I find in the bill that fish is to be made of one and flesh of another, and by no means the distinction in favor of the most meritorious persons, I am unable to see entirely why one man should be treated in one way and another man should be treated in a different way in the same bill and upon the allegation that the way in which the one man is to be treated is unfit treatment for any man.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, if, for instance, my friend the Senator from New York, invents and patents a machine and I make that machine and sell it, it is a very easy matter to take an account to ascertain what I make upon it. The price for which I sell each machine can be ascertained as a matter of course, and it is easy to compute the cost of each machine in that manufacture. That can be easily arrived at. It does no injustice. The profit is an actual profit, if any is made; and the inquisition is no such inquisition as follows the taking of an account where the machine is simply used in a business.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me, he does not understand me or I do not understand him.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Let me get through, Mr. President. Now take the other case. Suppose that instead of manufacturing that machine for sale, or manufacturing its product and selling that, I put that machine into a factory as a small part of a complicated business; I go along in that business, under the present law, for seventeen years or nearly seventeen years, and then I am called upon to render an account of profits. What is the amount of profits? All the profits that I have made in the business for seventeen years; and then it is for the court to decide how much of those profits is due to the single machine of my friend the Senator from New York.

What the committee have said is that in view of the fact of the inconvenience of taking an account of that kind, and because the expense was enormously great, so that a powerful patent combination could crush any adversary by it, and in view of the fact that it is absolutely impossible to arrive at any correct result in such a case as that, for it must be merely guess-work, as anybody can see, it is inexpedient to continue that rule, especially as decrees made under it have been exorbitant and unjust.

Now, as to savings, there is not only the objection which I have stated to a certain extent, though not to so large an extent as I have named, against the rule of allowing savings to be considered in an account as profits, but there is a further objection. My friend the Senator from New York says that it is easier to ascertain what the saving or the economy is of using a patented machine than to take this account of profits. That is undoubtedly true. But under the present law where an account of savings is taken, those savings thus ascertained are regarded as profits, and the plaintiff has a right to a decree for those profits and for the amount thus found.

What has proved to be the practical operation of this rule? Let me cite an instance. There appeared before the Committee on Patents the other day a very ingenious machine for sewing on the bottoms of shoes—for bottoming sewed shoes. I think it was shown that before the invention of that machine the cost of bottoming a pair of shoes was about forty cents; but the royalty which the proprietors of that machine exact from the parties who use it is something less than two cents a pair, I think. We will call it two cents. When that machine goes into use it immediately reduces the price of shoes, and that was proved to us. The price went down so that the cost of bottoming a pair of shoes in the selling price, where two cents royalty was paid to the owner of the patent, would not be more than about five cents. Now suppose that an innocent infringer—and, by the way, at least nine-tenths of the infringements are, I think, innocent—uses the machine. There is a controversy in many cases as to who owns the patent-right or who was the inventor. A man buys one of these machines. He uses it. He uses it for seventeen years, and then comes a patent combination which has proved that it is the owner of the patent, and requires him to account, and requires him to account under the rule of savings. Under that rule he would have to account for the difference between the cost of the old way of making, which is forty cents, and the new way, which is two cents. He would have to pay for each pair of shoes bottomed by that machine the sum of thirty-eight cents, when he could not in any market have got more than five cents. That is the practical operation of this rule.

The case which I have given is not a real case; but the evidence before your committee shows that under this rule by which savings must be accounted for as profits, such to some extent would invariably be its operation. That is unjust, and patentees cannot afford to have a law under which such wrongs may be committed.

The danger is, Mr. President, that if the law is not amended it will be repealed, and that was one of the arguments which induced the committee of the Senate to propose to change the rule.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator to state to the Senate a case or refer us to an authority in which any court ever held that the rule of damages would be, not the difference in fact, not the saving in fact, but the saving as it would have been if the market could have been held up as it was before, and the man could have put in his pocket the thirty-eight cents not one of which he ever did put there? Will the Senator refer us to a case in which the courts have held that that is the present rule of damages?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The courts have decided generally that under this rule of savings the difference between the cost of the old way of doing a thing and the new way by the invented machine is the profits.

Mr. CONKLING. But decided it in cases where the infringer did not sell, but where for example a railway company had been in the habit of repairing no matter what in a certain way;—there are many illustrations—adopting the new way there was a net saving of so much, and the court said that was the measure of damages? Now will the Senator refer me to a case where the courts have said in the case of a manufacturer for sale, that although in point of fact he did not save a cent, although there was no appreciable saving at all, the measure of damages would be the difference between what it used to cost him and what would have been his saving if he had been able after applying the new process to sell at what he got before? That is the case as he states it, and I want to know what court ever decided that?

Mr. WADLEIGH. No court has laid down any such specific rule as my friend the Senator from New York has suggested; but the courts have generally laid down rules covering the cases which I have named, and the operation of those rules laid down by the courts has been such as I have stated.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not state the rule. The Senator stated it. He stated, if he will pardon me, that it used to cost to bottom a pair of sewed shoes forty cents; that a man made an invention which after deducting the two cents royalty cheapened the bottoming of those shoes thirty-three cents; but the man did not sell the shoes for any more than he did before. The market price immediately graduated itself accordingly. Having stated these as his premises, the Senator stated that under the present rule of law the courts would say that the measure of damages was the difference between nothing and forty cents a pair, less the royalty and the actual remaining cost at three additional cents, five cents in all. Now, if there is any such case as that, I should like to know what court ever so decided.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Supreme Court of the United States decided in the case of Mowry vs. Whitney that the difference between the cost of the old method and the cost of the new was the profits in that case.

Mr. CONKLING. In the case of a vendor, in the case of a man manufacturing for sale or selling, or in the case of a railway company repairing its track?

Mr. WADLEIGH. There was no railway company in the case.

Mr. CONKLING. No, in that case; but I put it for the sake of the distinction.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Inasmuch as there was no railway company in the case, it is a little unfair to ask me what the court would have done if there had been one in it.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not ask that.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Let me state another case. A machine was invented for splitting wood, and the defendant used that machine for splitting wood. It was proved that he made no profits whatever. It was proved that the use of that machine lowered the price of wood per cord so that although the use of the machine saved some forty cents a cord in the wood, yet that the market price of the wood prepared by the machine did not begin to cover the forty cents. The court held in that case—the case of Mevs vs. Conover, I think—that the profits were the difference between the cost of splitting wood by hand and the cost of splitting it by that machine, and a very large decree was entered against the defendant although he had made nothing at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, some moments ago the Senator from New Hampshire commented, if I understood him, upon the ease with which segregated savings could be determined in one case and the difficulty or impossibility of finding them out in another. He said that if a man manufactured a machine for sale it was easy to determine the saving to him if he made profit by doing so, while if he manufactured the same machine and used it in his business it was likely to be guess-work to determine the advantage there. I should like to state two or three familiar cases to the Senator, and see what he would do with them, because I think he fitted his case to his theory and not his theory to the practical case.

Here is a man, for example, manufacturing wagons. If one will go into the neighborhood of Newark, New Jersey, he will find a fruitful field of illustration. Here are men making wagons and selling them, not in parts, but a wagon as an entirety. The simplest wagon one makes involves the use of a number, I might almost say a great number, of patented inventions. There are patents on the skein, there are patents on the threads of the screws which he may use; there are patents on the process by which a deposition of one metal upon another takes place so as to make plate or electrotyping; in short from the top of the wagon to the tire which rests on the ground nearly every incident has been the invention of somebody, and, unless the patent has died, is covered by a patent. That is a very familiar case moderately stated. It is a case the like of which occurs in every center of industry this country owns. Some man wakes up calling himself a patentee; he is sixteen years old and he has a patent in respect of the shape of a bolt or in respect of one of the links of the elliptic springs which are placed under this wagon. Now, will the Senator from New Hampshire tell me that the mode of ascertaining and segregating the profit derived from the use of that little thing, as he said in his other case, is easier or simpler than the mode of ascertaining the saving from the use of that same article by a man who used it in his business, instead of putting it on a great variety of other things and offering the whole for sale?

Mr. WADLEIGH. If my friend the Senator from New York desires an answer now, I will say that in the case he names I think it would be exceedingly difficult to ascertain what share of the defendant's profits were due to the plaintiff's invention; but great as would be that difficulty, it would be nothing as compared with the difficulty of deciding what proportion of the profits of the defendant were in a large and extensive business in which he used that wagon and what proportion of the profits of that whole business in which he used the wagon was due to the particular thing that my friend the Senator from New York speaks of. There is a vast difference between the two. Great as the difficulty is in the one case, it is nothing compared to the difficulty in the other.

Mr. President, the Committee on Patents found the law as it stands requiring an account to be taken in both these cases. They did not go so far as my friend the Senator from New York suggests, not so far as they might have gone, not so far as some of the committee wished they should go, if I may properly say so, but they did abolish the rule as to the most difficult and the least satisfactory class of cases. I am aware that what remains of the rule in this bill will be exceedingly difficult in many cases to carry out; but, as I said, the difficulty in those cases of carrying out this rule is as nothing compared to the difficulty of deciding in an extensive business in which that wagon might be used the particular proportion and share of the profits of that whole business due to that little thing in the wagon.

Mr. CONKLING. Nobody can doubt, Mr. President, who has listened to the Senator from New Hampshire, that he says that, in his own language: that he has said it; and we have every reason to believe that he will continue to say it. I was seeking for reasons. Logicians sometimes speak of a petitio principii; they sometimes call assertion "begging the question;" and whether the Senator is right about this or not, perhaps we shall see more clearly when we look further into it.

Now let me state another case that I was in the act of stating when the Senator made his last remarks. Here is a manufacturer of steam-engines, locomotives for railway companies. Probably somebody knows the number of patents or patented articles employed in constructing a locomotive-engine; I do not; but the number is very great.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Very large.

Mr. CONKLING. Very large indeed. Now it is quite familiar to all of us (and a good many States whose Senators I see here are fields in which illustrations can be found) that concerns are engaged in constructing locomotive-engines; they make a great number of them, and every one of them represents a large sum of money, so that every concern engaged in producing locomotive-engines in considerable quantities has a great total of annual business, and their accounts of course are very diversified and perhaps in some cases complicated. Here comes a man with a patent which relates to something or other to be used on a Yankee bonnet to catch sparks on an engine. It is one small thing, smaller than the bit of watch-spring which goes somewhere into an article of dress, a hat, or a cravat, or whatever it may be; it is almost infinitesimal in its bulk or importance when compared with this great iron horse in making which it is used. Now the Senator asserts that it is comparatively easy to ransack the accounts of this locomotive-engine company, to go through all of them, to add and subtract and divide and analyze and find out what proportion of the profits of this great concern comes from the use of a particular mode of bending a wire or securing an angle in a Yankee bonnet used on the spark-arrester of a locomotive-engine. I deny it, and I should be willing to rest my denial upon the uninstructed intelligence of any man. It is not so; it cannot be so. On the contrary it would be much easier for an uninstructed man to calculate an eclipse than it would be to take such accounts as I am speaking of, and from them deduce the aliquot part, segregated from all this wilderness of items and of elements, referable to the use of this one little trifling thing. And yet the bill provides in substance, changing the language from negative to affirmative, that accounts and evidence of profits may be gone into in respect of all persons who make profits and who are engaged in making for sale or selling "the thing patented or the product thereof as aforesaid." What those words "the product thereof as aforesaid" are intended to mean, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire. "Or the product thereof as aforesaid"—does that mean the article produced by the use of the machine?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Of course.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator says "of course." Then I have made a very inadequate statement of my objection; then I have fallen short, as I think, entirely in stating the whole of the objection to this. Now we are told that, notwithstanding the objection, notwithstanding the impossibilities (for they amount to those) stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, we are to enact that in the case of all persons whatever engaged in any business, no matter how complicated and extensive, an account may be required and evidence may search and analyze their accounts for all purposes whatever known to the law now, if they have made profits and if they manufacture machines for sale, in respect of all the outcome, all the facts of every name and nature of the use of any patented article in the production of anything whatever. If that is the design of it, I venture to say with more confidence than that with which I began, that, instead of abolishing the rule in the more offensive and less meritorious cases and preserving only so much of it as the committee thought, or as the Senate might think, was comparatively harmless, we are perpetuating and reasserting a part of the rule which has in it every element of vice to be found in the rule as it now stands, and which applies it arbitrarily in instances no more meritorious, no more compassable, no more easy of judicial ascertainment as distinguished from guesswork than the other cases to be excluded by this section. I venture to say that, after learning the meaning attributed to these words, which I was at first in doubt about, and to say it with considerable confidence that I am not mistaken about it.

Let me put the third case I was going to put. I take now the instance of men not engaged in making railway-carriages for sale, (as many concerns are whose names I might mention,) but the instance of railway companies which manufacture their own carriages, if they are only rubble cars, or platform cars, or burden cars of some sort. Here is a man who has a patent for the manufacture of axles in such a way as to avoid the possibility of a sand-crack in the iron; and I take that particular case because of a very leading instance to which the railroad between Albany and Boston was a party, the case of Hagerman vs. The Great Western Railway Company, where a man sued for an injury that befell him, which injury grew out, as it seemed, of a sand-crack in an iron axle, which the experts said there was no mode of detecting, no mode known to science in which the buyer could find it out. The court of last resort in my own State said "that is no answer to this action; there is a process in its manufacture by which it can be prevented, whether there be a process that will discover it afterward or not; and a common carrier of passengers, acting at his peril, if need be, must himself manufacture the apparatus with which he engages in this dangerous business; he must himself see to it that he applies all the precautions; but there is a mode of making iron axles by which sand-cracks will not occur." That railway company, admonished by the court, manufactures its own iron axles, and manufactures them by a process patented, not because it is a machine, but because it is a chemical process patentable by law. This company resorts to that process, and it makes axles all of which are good and stanch and reliable; and it is sued. Will it be said even in that case—and I have taken it because it is a much more difficult one and much more open to objection than many another I might have put—will it be said in that case that it is not as easy to ascertain the savings to the railway company from the use of this process as it would be had that railway company been the manufacturers of cars for sale, and used this mode of making the axles which it put in its cars and sold the whole as an entirety like the wagon with which I began as an illustration? And if that is to be said, why will it be said, and how can it be proved by reason? I do not know. I cannot see after hearing the Senator. On the contrary, it seems to me that if a man were to invent a process by which one of the eight or nine tenths of the fuel which now goes utterly to waste in the use of the steam-engine might be saved, the man who adopts that process and runs his engine with it in his own business is one as to whom you could ascertain and weigh in golden scales the advantage to him just as well as in the case of his next-door neighbor who adopts the same adjustment or apparatus for his engine and sells it to somebody else. If not, why not?

Mr. President, I incline to think that the argument against giving evidence of savings—I do not speak of an account in the technical sense—and looking at the books of defendants for that purpose, proves too much for this section. If it be sound as stated, then I say that I see little excuse and no justification for the provisions here made. If the argument is unsound or if it may be answered, then I do not see why it is not answerable as well in respect of one defendant as another, and I do not see why this section as it stands does not make, more than I supposed in the beginning, arbitrary and therefore unjust discriminations between different persons.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I suppose in dealing with any rule of damages in patent causes, whether the rule is to be declared from the bench or enacted in legislation, it is easy to state in the vast multitude of contrivances which are the subject of patents cases in which the rule would work injustice, cases in which another rule would be more just; but all that can be done, whether by the courts or by legislation, is to provide a simple, practical, general rule which will work justice, according to the experience of men, in a majority of cases. Now, undoubtedly, a Senator may take an hour, as an hour has been taken, a Senator may take a day, a Senator may take a week, and he would not have exhausted the list of supposable cases in which it is more difficult to take an account of the profits than it is to take an account of the savings in other supposable cases. But still the fact remains that the section as reported by the committee excludes accounts in cases in which as a rule they are more burdensome to parties and less likely to contribute to doing practical justice in the cause, and admits accounts in the class of cases in which as a rule they are more likely to do practical justice in the cause, and less (according to the experience of persons conversant in such trials) likely to be instruments of injustice and oppression.

Now what is the rule as the committee have left it? The Senate will remember that the rule of law permitting the account of the saving to the particular individual by reason of the trespass upon the patent-right of a patentee is a departure from the general practice adopted in damages in all other cases, and the admitting evidence of the price for which the thing sold on the other hand is precisely in correspondence with the rule of damages in all other cases where the common law prevails as a system. Suppose a person by force and without right takes possession of my dwelling house, or my mill, and maintains against me the occupation of that dwelling-house or of that mill for a considerable period of time. The injury to me by the deprivation of the use of my property, the jury get at as well as they can upon the evidence; but the special fact whether the man saved in his business by having the occupation of that property so tortiously gotten into his possession is a fact which would be excluded from the consideration of the jury, and in regard to which evidence would not be admitted. The answer would be, "it is the remote, and not the proximate result; it is a result which might have happened, or might not;" and therefore, as I said, the old rule which admits an account or evidence of savings in any case in patent causes is an exception to the almost universal rule of damages applied in all other cases by the tribunals of this country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator (if I do not interrupt him) remember any instance in which any statute of the United States or of any State has regulated a rule of damages in an action at law?

Mr. HOAR. That is another proposition altogether. It is not a question, I submit respectfully to the Senator from Vermont, pertinent to the particular point with which I am now dealing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought it was, or I would not have asked it. Probably I am mistaken.

Mr. HOAR. I do not mean that it is not pertinent to the general question we are discussing, but I am dealing now with the question of the wisdom of this rule, not with the question what the reason is for enacting a rule of damages by statute.

In the next place, in regard to the sale of the thing, the profit for which the party has sold it, that is the regular, and ordinary, and usual test of damage. A man is deprived of a horse, or his dwelling-house is tortiously burned up, or any other property is destroyed; its market value is one, and ordinarily the true, test of the damage, and the market value ascertained by a sale of the very thing in dispute is of course evidence admissible. The committee therefore restore the rule of damages in patent causes as nearly as may be to an analogy with that rule which the universal sense of justice, where justice is administered according to the forms of the common law, has established in all similar cases.

The Senate will observe in the cases which have been put by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Ohio, how ample and extensive the remedy is left. In the first place the remedy by injunction remains untouched, so that whatever expenditure may have been made by the infringer in his business, however inconvenient the abandonment of a manufacture or a use being an infringement may be to the defendant, the inexorable injunction comes down and protects the plaintiff absolutely for the future; the statute only deals with damages for the past. It leaves open in the first place where the owner of the patent is himself using it, making it profitable to himself as an article, the use of which is to be licensed, and in that case the license fee which he has established by a number of transactions is the measure of damages. Nobody, I suppose, will question the justice of that, so that if he has held it open to mankind and has established his price, that price which the defendant shall pay, with the addition of a special award to be made by the court in a case of willful infringement, is to be the remedy. In the case supposed by the Senator from Michigan, and I think by the Senator from New York, where the owner of the patent does not propose to open it to public use but proposes to avail himself of his constitutional property by a use made by himself, there a license fee not having been established, the reasonable compensation or license fee for the use is to be determined by all competent evidence an abundant and ample compensation in such cases. If the use by the infringement would be a destruction of the purpose to which the owner of the patent had applied it by the destruction of his business, then of course the jury in determining what it would have been reasonable for him to impose as a condition to that use would have regard to that important circumstance.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, that as the practical and general rule, the rule of damages which the committee have reported in the bill is the sound and correct one.

And now I propose to answer the question put by my honorable friend, the Senator from Vermont, whether it has ever been known that the rule of damages has been established by legislation. There are very many instances in our legislation where legislatures and parliaments have been compelled to interfere to alter the rule of law established by the courts in regard to this matter of damages. The matter of highway damages is a familiar instance in the New England States. We have from time immemorial had special statutes on that subject on our statute-book and have made a new one within the last twelve months in Massachusetts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my honorable friend thinks that the case of what he calls highway damages meets the inquiry I made to him, I respectfully submit that I think he did not understand it. I inquired whether he knew of any statute which undertook to regulate the rule of damages in an action at law between man and man for property. I suppose what he means by "highway damages," as that seems to be a general New England system, is where property is appropriated for the public use under the power of eminent domain.

Mr. HOAR. No, I speak of injuries to travelers—damages sustained by travelers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That they shall not get over $5,000 damages?

Mr. HOAR. Or may have double damages in certain cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not regulate the principle on which damages are to be assessed. It only says there shall be a maximum limit.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to be a pretty sharp limitation on the principle on which they were to be assessed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not on the principle, but on the degree of its application.

Mr. HOAR. But, Mr. President, the whole patent law is the creature, the property in the incorporeal and intangible thing called an invention or discovery is itself the creature of that paramount act of legislation, the Constitution of the United States. The whole law is entirely not the result of common-law principles, but the result of special statute enactment at every step—both law and the remedy. Now, it is found by a complaint coming from the great agricultural interest of the country, coming from the great railroad interest of the country, coming from the great manufacturing interest of the country, that the power which the patent law puts in the hands of complainants who desire to oppress innocent defendants, and of defendants who desire to resist meritorious honest complainants requires of them the abandonment of their legal rights or the incurring of the expense of costly, protracted, burdensome investigations, lasting often years and years—there was one case referred to before the Patent Committee which had lasted some twelve or fifteen years if I mistake not—into the details of vast businesses and great occupations. I say the complaint came that that was a grievance which rather than to further endure, these great interests were prepared, if necessary, to sacrifice the entire patent system itself; and the committee found and believed that that complaint from those great classes of our citizens endangered the entire patent system, and that to endanger the patent system of the country was to endanger its manufacturing supremacy and its place in the ranks of civilization among the nations of the earth. The committee under these circumstances adopted the best practical method of remedying this grievance that they could devise. They left the right to the account of profits open in the cases whereas as a rule they believed that account of profits could be made practicable cheaply and was required by the justice of the cause. They destroyed the right to the account of savings in cases where as a rule they believed that to leave it open would be burdensome, costly, tend to enormous delays, and would be to overthrow as a rule and as a general practice the administration of justice between the parties in such causes.

Now, the committee believe, in spite of the thousand ingenious cases which may be put of exceptions, that to require in a simple litigation in regard to some slight patented article an account of the vast business and an inspection of the vast books of the person who may use that article in one of his processes, as a general rule is unjust and unwise, and that on the other hand to leave open to parties the right to require an account of the profits for which the thing has actually been sold which the infringer has purloined from the owner, is wise, reasonable, and just; and although you can undoubtedly put cases where the latter may be more burdensome than the former, yet as a general rule it will not be the case.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay action upon this bill, because if it is to pass, action must be had upon it soon, and I shall add but a single remark to what has been said by my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Senator from New York in his last remarks took it for granted that this bill abolished all evidence of what savings could be effected by a patented invention, as I understood him. That the committee did not understand to be the case. The bill provides:

> That nothing herein contained shall exclude other evidence as to the utility and advantage of the invention as one element to aid in determining a license fee where none has been established.

What is "the utility and advantage" of an invention if it be not the saving that that invention will effect in the business or manufacture in which it is used? Your committee believe that under that provision of this bill evidence can be admitted showing what saving the invention will effect, and that is all the provision there need be upon that subject.

Then we are told that the committee made this and the committee made that provision. Mr. President, those provisions exist in the present practice of the court. The committee makes nothing. It abolishes a certain rule to a certain extent where the committee believed that rule has been most unsatisfactory and most unjust in its operation. It does not wholly abolish it. And the committee do not make that portion of the rule which they leave unmolested. The committee believe that far as this bill goes it is an improvement upon the present law, and that if passed, as my friend the Senator from Massachusetts has stated, it will benefit not only the public but patentees as well.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, whatever errors we may fall into we shall be inexcusable if we do not avoid any mistake upon this bill while there is yet a misunderstanding of the meaning. The Senator from New Hampshire thinks such a misunderstanding is mine; and to ascertain how that is, I want to submit an actual case to him and get him to tell me, if he will, what becomes of it under this bill. I will take now the instance of an iron concern whose business it is to carry on puddling. That concern is losing a hundred dollars a day. I wish the case I am putting were an imaginary one; but it is not. An invention is made for puddling iron, and the concern supposed adopts that invention, and it is so valuable that, instead of carrying on business at a loss of one hundred dollars a day as before, they save ninety dollars and the loss per day is only ten dollars. Will the Senator from New Hampshire tell me would the inventor in that case be able to recover or not, and, if he would be able to recover, under which one of the clauses of this proposed statute?

Mr. WADLEIGH. In the case supposed by my friend, the Senator from New York, evidence could be presented showing what advantage the patented invention had been, the effects that it had produced, the saving that it had made——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not understand that.

Mr. CONKLING. Nor do I either.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I ask that I shall not be interrupted by my friend, the Senator from Illinois.

I say so because in that case what the invention can do in the way of savings is "the utility and advantage of the invention." Now what cannot be done, what this bill prevents from being done, is going into an account of all the business in which that invention has been used to ascertain in the first place what the profits of that invention have been, and then what proportion of the profits is due to the invention, or compelling the defendant in such a case to account for savings as profits when these savings in no case would be his profits, but almost always, from the natural operation of the laws of trade, would be very many times greater than those profits.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator from New Hampshire sits down, will he be good enough to look at some of the lines of this section between line 1 and line 15, and tell me whether he means to leave standing what he has now said, in spite of the provisions there found?

Mr. WADLEIGH. What is the particular point?

Mr. CONKLING. I call the Senator's attention especially to line 10, beginning with the word "except." Certainly his understanding is so unlike mine about a matter which seems to me pretty plain that one of us must have read this very carelessly.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I answered the question of the Senator from New York so far as it relates to evidence of savings being admitted in the case to which he referred that it can be admitted. No account of savings can be required, but they may be proved in certain cases to establish what the damages of the plaintiff are, what the advantage derived from the use of that invention is, what the invention will do in the way of saving.

Now, in answer to the question of my friend the Senator from New York just put, it is true that this bill abolishes all accounts for profits where no profits have been made——

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator mean what he says now?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Where no actual profits have been made.

Mr. CONKLING. That it abolishes all recoveries for profits where no profits have been made?

Mr. WADLEIGH. No; all accounts for profits. That is, the account for profits in all other cases is based upon actual profits which the defendant has received. A rule has been adopted in patent causes which compels a defendant to account for profits where he has made none, and to account for profits where there have been simply savings, although he has made a loss in his business and no profit at all. Now, the view of the committee was, that where there had been no profits at all, nobody ought to be required to account for profits which were simply imaginary; that in all such cases the plaintiff should show what injury he had suffered from the use of his invention; that he should not compel the defendant to pay profits when there had been none, but that in all such cases he should show by evidence the utility and advantage of his invention, and by all other competent and material evidence just what he was entitled to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Now, Mr. President, I will say a word, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] does not seem to be in his seat. I certainly did not wish to be offensive to the Senator from New Hampshire in rising at the time that I did. I thought he supposed I was offensive to him.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I did not think of such a thing.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I did not mean to be so at all. I simply meant to state that that was not the understanding I had of the section, nor is it the understanding of very many abler men than myself.

Mr. HOAR. There are not many abler.

Mr DAVIS, of Illinois. I consider that there are. It seems to me that clearly this section proposes to do two things: to abolish all account of profits in a chancery suit, unless profits have been made. Now, the case cited by the Senator from New York when he last sat down——

Mr. WADLEIGH. That is the intention of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will go on a little while. I know that we say this man who is engaged in the manufacture of iron and is losing $100 a day gets hold of a patent invented by somebody and uses it and loses $10 a day; and is not that man richer in consequence of using that invention, and should he not pay for it? Is not that the true measure? It is the net advantage to that man which he has in the business.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I ask the Senator from Illinois whether it is fair to presume that a man who is losing $100 a day will constantly keep on in any business?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir; many manufacturers who are losing that amount do it to keep their hands together. They do it to keep in such a position that when better times come they can manufacture at a profit. That is the answer to that question.

This bill proposes that there shall be no account of savings, that is, there shall be no account of profits where no profits have been made. It cuts off savings entirely. The Senator from New Hampshire thinks that the proviso, which I shall read, allows the court to receive an account of savings. Why not put it in plainly?

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall exclude other evidence as to the utility and advantage of the invention as one element to aid in determining a license fee where none has been established.

The Senator from Ohio wants evidence touching the subject of profits and savings to be considered by the court in determining what is the proper license fee to be established in that case. You cannot establish a license fee in all cases alike. It depends upon the utility of the invention, the magnitude of it. It is very small in some cases, and very large in others.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Will my friend, the Senator from Illinois, let me state right here my answer to that?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Oh, yes.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I believe that the bill abolishes the technical account for savings, and in the case which the Senator supposes the court would not decree that an account should be taken showing the savings which the defendant had made in his particular business, going over his books and all his business affairs, ascertaining the whole amount of his savings and then deciding how much was due to this particular machine, and thereby ascertaining the savings which the invention had effected. But what does it authorize? It authorizes the plaintiff, by any evidence he may see fit, except by an account going over all the business matters of the defendant or going over his savings, to prove the saving his machine will effect, what is its utility and its advantages; and that can be done without any taking of a technical account at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. When you say that the court shall not allow a patentee to take an account of profits you cut him off from everything in the world that is available to him. When you say that the advantage to the infringer of the patent cannot be estimated inside of the profit you take it away entirely. The Senator says it is a great hardship to have the books of a manufacturer opened up for investigation. You have that done when you allow an account for profits. You are to investigate for years and years to ascertain whether there have been any profits or not, when it is very difficult to prove that; but it is very easy to prove that this man has been advantaged $100 a day or $500 a day by the use of a particular machine.

Then, again, Mr. President, if all account of profits is to be disallowed unless profits are actually made by the infringer, why confine this case to the thing actually patented or the product thereof? As I said the other day, this excludes a large class of cases where service is performed. It excludes a spoke in a wagon-wheel if it has been patented; it excludes machinery in a mine; it excludes machinery by which houses are built; it excludes the brake by which a railroad train is run, and a thousand other things of that kind. Where service is performed it certainly should be put on the same footing as "the thing patented or the product thereof." I simply rose because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] was not in his seat at the time.

Mr. CONKLING. While the Senator from Ohio is rising, I ask him to allow me to get a piece of information. The Senator from New Hampshire—and I was about to reply to that, but I was very glad that the Senator from Illinois proceeded—called attention to these words:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall exclude other evidence as to the utility and advantage of the invention as one element—

I ask the Senate to observe this—to aid in determining a license fee where none has been established.

Not to aid in determining the damages; not to aid in informing the court or jury how much the one man is entitled to recover of the other on the question of profits or savings; but simply to make an adjustment, to fix a standard of the royalty which the one man should pay to the other for the use of his invention. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to tell me whether this bill, should it become a law, is at that point to speak both backwards and forwards, or whether it is to speak only of the future; in other words, in a given case, when this license fee has been established, whether the decree is to be one under which this license fee would be paid as of a past time, running from the beginning of the patent down to the date of the decree, or whether it is to be a license fee fixed as the rate at which for the future the infringer is to pay?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The past use, of course.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to see as to that, because I am informed by one member of the committee that it is not "of course;" that the reverse is the meaning. Will the Senator from New Hampshire be good enough to tell me which of these two meanings the committee does ascribe to this language?

Mr. WADLEIGH. What copy of the bill has the Senator?

Mr. CONKLING. The words are on page 5, at line 40, and so on. It is the proviso that the Senator read; and I want to know whether after a man succeeds in establishing by this proof what the license fee should be he is to be entitled to recover for the past infringement at that rate, or whether it is a license fee to be established for future proceeding.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The copy of the bill which the Senator from New York has in his hands is not the copy I have; and consequently——

Mr. CONKLING. But I have called the Senator's attention to the proviso which he read in the Senate, which is in all the copies of the bill, and which I will read to him again, as he read it to me:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall exclude other evidence as to the utility and advantage of the invention as one element to aid in determining a license fee where none has been established.

My question is whether it is the intention that that determination shall be one under which for the future the infringer is to pay, or whether the meaning is that the complainant may recover for all the past time this license fee per annum?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The chairman of the Committee on Patents [Mr. BOOTH] has in his hands a similar copy of the bill that the Senator from New York has.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not hear the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WADLEIGH. That part of the bill which answers the question of the Senator from New York is found from the twenty-fourth to the twenty-ninth line of section 2, and it is as follows:

If a license fee has not already been established by a reasonable number of transactions applicable to the case at bar, a license fee for the use actually made shall be determined from all the evidence in the case.

If that language is not plain, I do not know what is plain language.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator be kind enough to those who like me have difficulty about the clause, to tell me whether the language I have read to him means that the license fee is to be established for the future, or whether it means from the beginning of the patent a recovery is to be had for the amount of this license fee for each elapsed year?

Mr. WADLEIGH. If the license fee is to be "for the use actually made," the Senator from New York can answer the question as well as I can. I apprehend that no use of the patent could have been made in the future, and consequently the license fee would not cover its future use.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from New Hampshire, who is managing this bill, is content with that answer and that statement, I am; and if it benefits the prospects of the bill I think it benefits them in the estimation of those who have not listened to his statement.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The establishment of a license fee by a patentee is undoubtedly in one case evidence of what he should receive in other cases. The establishment of a license fee in one case may be some evidence in another case to show what the patentee should receive. But as I understand the language of the bill it applies to the use actually made; it does not apply to any use that may hereafter be made.

Mr. HOAR. The whole section is a section in regard to a measure of damages for past transactions. There is nothing else in it.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to refer to the subject of savings, which was alluded to by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] and illustrated by him as he seemed to think in a way which showed the soundness of the doctrine of allowing savings as profits. The instance which he cited was that of a man engaged in business losing a hundred dollars a day without using the invention and losing only $10 a day with the invention. I then put the question whether it was to be presumed that such a man would continue to do business at a loss of a hundred dollars a day. The reply was that there were many instances in which he would do so, looking to future operations. Now I wish to put the question in a little different form; but I will not call on the Senator to answer it at this instant. Here is a man losing a hundred dollars a day, and under certain circumstances he loses but $10. Is it to be presumed that when the man is losing the $100 a day he would be likely to continue to do business at that losing rate as long as the man who was losing only $10 a day, in looking to future operations?

Let me put one other question. Ought not a man who is doing a losing business to be at liberty to stop that business whenever he pleases? If so, then the rules of equity established at present by the Federal courts are wrong. Why? Because they go upon the assumption that such a man would continue through all time, so far as that is concerned, to do business at that particular losing rate, and they give him no chance to stop. That is illustrated in a number of cases which I cited here the other day, and to which I will not now refer. Therefore the idea of accounting for savings as profits rests entirely upon assuming as true what we know is not true.

I did not rise mainly for the purpose of replying to that portion of the argument. I wish to say here once for all that I look upon the rights of a patentee as sacred as the rights of any other man; that I look upon the property of a patent as sacred as property of any other kind; but no more sacred. Such property is entitled to the same protection but to no greater protection. What should be the rule where any man has been injured? What is the rule of justice and equity? It is that the person injured shall recover a fair and just and adequate compensation, and no more. The rule which is complained of is a fiction of equity which holds the infringer of a patent in all cases as a trustee. It is a pure fiction of law in all cases except where the amount of profits would tend to fix a just compensation; but where the amount of profits has no relation whatever to what would be a just compensation, then it ought not to be taken as the measure of recovery, because in that case the rule always must produce injustice.

The argument made by the Senator from New York in illustrating the difficulties and I will say the absurdities of carrying out this fiction of law in accounting for profits where a patent has been given for one little item in a machine, is one of the strongest arguments in my opinion that could be made against the justice and propriety of keeping up this mere fiction of law where it can result in nothing but injustice, where the profits do not even tend to show what is a just compensation. There is just the one class of cases which I mentioned where the profits do tend to show, and where they do measure, a just compensation, and that is where the patentee has chosen to retain the entire monopoly of his invention and to manufacture and supply the market himself. Then when an infringer comes in and manufactures, the profits ought to be allowed, because but for that infringement the patentee would have made that amount, or at least he was prevented from making it. But that is not the case with one patent in a hundred. The objection which the Senator from New York makes to the bill is not so strong when made to the bill as it is when made to the entire system as it now stands. The very difficulties, the very absurdities, which he has illustrated here are those existing in the present course of adjudication in the law as it now stands; and the bill is objected to because it does not cure the law.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me, the bill is objectionable for another reason.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. There may be other reasons.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me, there is something beyond that. The bill is objectionable because the distinction the Senator now points out is made, and made not in favor of the innocent, the defenseless, the people who need protection, but made in favor of exactly those persons who do not need it. It is an exemption of aggregated capital, of powerful combinations, of intelligent persons from a rule of law which in the same bill we propose to visit upon the ignorant, the weak, and those who accidentally become subject to it.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I do not so understand it.

Mr. CONKLING. I do.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. In the first place the bill does exempt from this rule of profits all mere users of a machine, where the user, that is, the innocent owner, does not make or sell the machine or its product. The manufacturer is the one who does it willfully, if anybody does, and those who manufacture with a machine and sell its products are the parties who ought to be bound, for before they do that they inquire more than the man who simply purchases a mowing-machine or a reaper or anything of that kind. I think the bill is just, as far as it goes, but I do not think it goes far enough. I think it should not allow an account of profits to be taken in any case except in the single class of cases where the patentee retains the entire monopoly of the patent and refuses to make sale of his license.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I apologized yesterday, Mr. President, for assuming to criticise the work of the Committee on Patents, because I was perfectly aware of what the committee itself has since advised us in open Senate, that it had bestowed unusual care and reflection and consideration upon the questions involved in this section of the bill in reference to the establishment of the rule and measure of damages which should apply in all suits, both at law and in equity, for the recovery of damages for the infringement of patent-rights. But I am certainly not mistaken, as the debate which has sprung up to-day proves, as to the importance of viewing critically every legislative attempt to introduce a new rule of decision in cases to be submitted to the arbitrament of judicial tribunals. I doubt whether in the history of legislative improvement, from the time of the statute of frauds to the present, any statute seeking to do that has not introduced more new questions difficult of solution than it has settled old ones, the evils of which were hard to be borne. I venture to make the prediction here that if this bill becomes a law it will give rise to more, and more expensive, litigation than it will compose strifes which have arisen under the existing rules. It is with a view of simplifying its provisions and removing ambiguities that I have moved the amendment which is now pending; and as the vote is to be taken upon it, I desire to call the attention of Senators to the precise effect of the section as it stands compared with what will be the effect in case the proposed amendment should be adopted.

Let me, in the first place, say a word in passing in reply to the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who seemed to think that in contrast with the provisions of the bill as they now stand, the adoption of the amendment would sweep away the exclusive right which by the Constitution of the United States is guaranteed to inventors. That is a misconception, for the reason that the actual enjoyment of the exclusive right does not depend upon the application of any rule of damages. It depends upon the proper, prompt, and effective administration of equity jurisprudence in wielding the power of the injunction. It is that writ of prohibition which secures by its possession the owner of such a right in the enjoyment of all its privileges; and that is not disturbed either by the bill in its present form or in the form which it will assume in case the amendment proposed shall be adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, but he seems to leave out of view, when he speaks of the redress by injunction, what I suppose he will agree is a well-established principle of equity jurisprudence, that if the answer of the defendant in an infringement case totally denies the equity of the bill, by denying that the thing complained of is an infringement of an acknowledged patent, or denying the validity of the patent itself, it having not before been established in some court, then a preliminary injunction cannot go, and the patentee must wait until the end of a long litigation before he can get his injunction at all. Then, the Senator says, when you come to that, he shall not have any exclusive right at all, but all this man shall be obliged to account for is exactly what, if the patentee had been willing to hire him out the right, would have been a fair price.

Mr. MATTHEWS. To be sure the case exists, because there is a period during which there would be an unauthorized and illegal usurpation and use of the exclusive right; and in that case, as in all other cases, there would be an award by the proper process of an equity court of damages by way of compensation which the complainant has in the mean time suffered, as ascertained by the final decree.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but you say that the damages shall only be a license fee.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I say the damages shall be the market price of the property used, the market value, that which anybody in the market would give; and that is all that can be given appropriately under the name of damages, except in those cases where the infringement has been willful, as to which special provision is made for an extra allowance to cover the costs and expenses of asserting, maintaining, and defending the right.

Let us see what the propositions contained in the bill, as reported, are. They are, first, that very thing of which the Senator from Vermont complains, namely, that the old principle of awarding compensation in equity cases is abolished.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They still leave actual profits.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Let us see. It is declared in the very first sentence of the section that the rule and measure of damages shall be the same, both in actions at law and in suits in equity. The distinction between law and equity in that very particular (in which it has been supposed that equity was more conservative of the property rights than a court of law would be) is taken away, and the complainant is compelled to rely upon and resort to only that measure and rule of compensation which he can obtain by a verdict or award of damages as a compensation for the injury which has been inflicted upon him. I agree that in every case of a violation of the right the complainant ought to have that much. He ought to have a fair, full, adequate, and complete compensation for the loss to him of the enjoyment of his property, just as if it had been visible and tangible personal property, just as if it had been real property on which a trespass had been committed. Further, I am of opinion that every avenue of evidence ought to be kept open for proof in each individual case according to its circumstances, and the amount in such a case should be reasonable and fair, and that that should be left absolutely upon that evidence to the discretion of the tribunal charged by law with the finding of such a verdict or the making of such a decree, without any restraint, without any artificial rules to bind that discretion, without shutting out any light; so that every fact and every circumstance which is material and important to the determination of the question shall be permitted to be proved.

In undertaking to specify the various cases in which rules for the apportionment of this compensation shall be adopted, the bill of the committee first takes the case where it is the design and the desire of the patentee to put his patent upon the market to make it a subject of sale to other persons. In that case it is said by the Senator from New Hampshire in advocacy of the bill that no one can object to the application of the rule of the market price, where the vendor seeks a market for his wares. The very object he has in view in obtaining his patent is to use it in that way, that he may by sales of the right to any one in the community who desires it obtain a revenue and income from it. It is said that is a fair rule; that it gives a full equivalent, and that when the party sues for damages for the recovery of that compensation, the very fact that he is seeking that and not the enjoyment and possession of his exclusive right by means of an injunction, shows that he is willing to give a license to the defendant and will be satisfied with a proper, usual, reasonable license fee. Yet the bill immediately makes an exception from that rule, after establishing it as a fair and just rule. After establishing the principle that that is all that ought to be claimed, where the patentee desires to go into the market for the purpose of sale, they except it in all cases where the defendant has made an actual profit from making for sale, or selling, or using the thing patented, or the product thereof. Why should that exception be made. If the plaintiff gets all that he would have asked from others for a license to do the thing, why should he as against a party unlicensed recover any greater amount? If it be said that he ought to be permitted to do so because the defendant may have willfully and knowingly violated the plaintiff's right, and so put him to the necessity and expense of maintaining it and asserting it, the answer is that in another clause of the same section that case is provided for by the committee's bill, for in that case the court is authorized to award against the defeated party such sum, by way of counsel fees and expenses of suit, as it shall deem just and reasonable in order to punish the defendant, if he be the one in default, for the willfulness, maliciousness, and vexatiousness of his conduct. But if any exception is to be made at all, why not, as inquired by several Senators, make the exception as broad as the fact, instead of confining it only to those cases where an actual profit has been made from the manufacture or sale of the thing patented or the product thereof? For it is manifest, as has been already so fully pointed out as to obviate the necessity of dwelling upon it again, that actual profits may be made just as much in violation of the rights of a patentee by those who do not manufacture for sale or sell the thing patented or the product thereof, but who use it merely in their own business and for their own purposes.

The next proposition of the bill is to deal with those cases where by a reasonable number of transactions in the market no market price has been established for the use of the patented article, and there the provision of the bill seems to be perfectly fair; for it declares that in such a case a license fee for the use actually made shall be determined from all the evidence in the case. If it had stopped there, it would have stopped just where I desire it to stop, for then there would be no limitation upon the kind and the character and the amount and the degree of the evidence which would be admissible for the purpose of proving what was a fair compensation for this use. But the bill does not stop there. It goes on and in that connection declares that—

> No account of savings shall in any case be allowed; and no evidence or account of the defendant's profits shall in any case be admitted, except as to actual profits resulting from making for sale or selling the thing patented, or the product thereof as aforesaid.

We exclude the evidence of such profits, and I take it that evidence of savings would be excluded under the same head, although perhaps not technically embraced in the words that introduce the sentence, where only an account of savings is forbidden. But how can you prove the actual profits made by reason of the use of the invention without showing the saving and economy in the manufacture which have been produced by the use of the invented thing? Yet not only is an account of such profits forbidden, but proof by way of evidence to establish what would be a fair amount for the defendant to pay is forbidden. The other language which admits other evidence as to the utility and advantage of the invention as one element only strengthens the conclusion which excludes the evidence of profits and of savings.

Mr. BOOTH. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. MATTHEWS. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BOOTH. In line 36, on the fifth page, does the Senator construe the word "account" in the phrase "no account of savings shall in any case be allowed" as excluding from the testimony the amount the machine itself has saved over any other known device? I know the intention of the committee was simply to shut out the account technically of the savings and the making of that the measure of damages; but certainly it was intended that the saving that the machine made should be one of the elements that should determine its value and enter into the determination of the license fee.

Mr. MATTHEWS. My answer to the Senator would be that perhaps the conclusion which he combats might not be deduced from that language alone. Taking the section altogether, as a court would do it, by the four corners, the inference is to my mind strong that when the offer was made upon an actual trial of a cause to show the economy by the use of the particular machine in the manufacture in which it was used, it would be excluded, not because that was an attempt to take an account between the parties, but because it was an attempt to show what were the actual profits, which is excluded by the succeeding language.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to remind him that he speaks of the whole section? I suggest to him that he need not deal with anything more than the paragraph at which the Senator from California points his question to be able to say all that he has said, because following the words to which the Senator from California alluded are these:

> And no evidence or account of the defendant's profits shall in any case be admitted, except as to actual profits resulting from making for sale or selling the thing patented, or the product thereof as aforesaid.

How can there be any doubt, as to the cases thus excluded, that the effect of that paragraph is exactly that for which the Senator from Ohio insists?

Mr. MATTHEWS. I think there can be no doubt about it, that in the very offer which I supposed, where a party litigant by his counsel proposes to show that there were profits made in the manufacture by the use of a patented article, which consisted simply in saving and in economy, that would be excluded by the court on the ground that no proof or evidence could be submitted on the point, unless it went to the length of establishing "actual profits resulting from the making for sale or selling the thing patented or the product thereof as aforesaid."

The effect of the amendment which I propose as a substitute for that language is to remove at least any doubt that may arise upon that by declaring:

> But evidence thereof may be admitted as tending to prove what shall be deemed a reasonable license fee as compensation for the infringement.

I would be better satisfied, greatly better, to dispense with the use of the words "a reasonable license fee" throughout the entire section, and to leave the rights of patentees, both in equity and at law, so far as the question of compensating them for infringement is concerned, to the general rule which now establishes the proper measure of damages in every other case of violations of the rights of property, giving to the patentee that in its fullest extent, with all the benefit of common-law rules and common-law evidence, and upon that, and beside it, and beyond it, and above it, the extraordinary relief by the writ of injunction to secure him in the possession and enjoyment of his exclusive right; for after that has been broken and during the time the cause is pending, and when he is endeavoring to establish by evidence the fact of the infringement or the fact of his exclusive right, he is like every other litigant in court under similar circumstances; he is compelled from the nature of the case to accept that which the law gives him in lieu of his exclusive right, and that is a compensation in money for the temporary loss of it. It might as well be said that it was a violation of the right of property to allow as is done in my own State, and I believe in most others, in actions of replevin for personal property, where it is open to the plaintiff, if he chooses to make an affidavit which establishes in the first instance his right to the writ, to take the defendant's personal property into his possession and acquire a title to it as against the defendant and all the world, and by virtue of a transfer merely produced and wrought by the bringing of his suit, leaving to the defendant not the right of being restored to the possession of the identical property which in the mean time may have been destroyed, but only to such compensation as a jury may award, based upon those rules of law and those rules of evidence which in all other cases of violations of the rights of property have been established by the common law for the protection not only of that plaintiff and defendant, but of us all. I agree that the right of a patentee under his patent is a right of property which is secured by the Constitution, and it ought to be protected and enforced by the law, but exactly upon the same principles and upon the same rules of evidence, and his damages measured by the same principles of law, as in other similar cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 15, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. W. V. TUDOR, Methodist Episcopal Church South, Saint Louis, Missouri.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MANAGEMENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the representatives of the Religious Society of Friends in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, remonstrating against the transfer of the management of the Indians from the Interior Department to the War Department; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives
of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the representatives of the Religious Society of Friends in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, respectfully represents that your memorialists have regarded with deep interest and anxiety the proposition now pending before your body, to transfer the management of the Indians within the United States from the Interior Department to the War Department, and they would respectfully but earnestly remonstrate against such transfer for the following reasons:

The past history of the Indian nations of this continent proves that they are susceptible to the softening influences of kindly Christian treatment, and the European discoverers found that as they were thus approached they almost invariably responded in a friendly and even generous spirit. The peaceable policy pursued by William Penn and the early settlers of Pennsylvania and New Jersey avoided all Indian wars in those colonies so long as it was adhered to, a period of seventy years; while the settlers of New England, who depended on military defense during the same period, were almost constantly embroiled in desolating contests with the aborigines.

We believe it is essential for the ultimate safety and the best interests of the Indians that they should be trained in the habits and arts of civilization, and should be induced to exchange the unsettled life of the chase for the practice of agriculture. It is evident that the necessary instruction to promote these ends cannot be looked for from men whose own training and habits have been of an altogether different character. It is a fact admitted by most military officers familiar with the subject, and proved by experience, that the presence of soldiers among the Indians is a fruitful source of demoralization and disease. In a memorial to Congress by the "United States Indian commission," dated "July 14, 1868," the view is expressed that "one of the finest physical types of man has already become seriously enfeebled, and that tribes originally comparatively pure are fast sinking into a grossness of vice which threatens their utter extinction. This latter evil, in all its destructive extent, seems to be an inevitable attendant of the presence of our troops in the Indian country. All these and many other disgraceful facts are attested by respectable officers of the Government, by a large number of Indian chiefs, and by many trustworthy private citizens." It must be further borne in mind that the misery thus produced is not confined to the immediate victims, but reaches in its consequences to generations yet unborn. It is clear, therefore, to us that the proposed transfer would greatly interfere with the educational agencies now in operation, would retard the progress of the Indians, and, we do not doubt, would cause a retrograde movement.

The system of treatment inaugurated of late years, whereby men and women of philanthropic views were engaged to co-operate with the Government in instructing and encouraging the Indian tribes in literary knowledge, Christian morality, the arts of agriculture and of civilized life, we consider a truly wise and just one, and we trust it may be continued. Its practical value has been already proved by the result among many of the tribes, where it has been in operation for several years. Some of these, who were as intractable and as warlike as any Indians on the continent, have yielded to the patient efforts of their agents and teachers until now they remain on and cultivate portions of their reservations; many of them send their children to the schools and have begun to build houses and raise stock. Should a similar line of action continue to be steadily pursued by the Government, there is abundant reason for believing that a few years would suffice to render the wildest tribes of the West peaceful, law-abiding, and settled in their mode of life, and eventually self-supporting and even useful citizens. Shall we now arrest the progress of the good work by a change of policy and the return to a system which has hitherto proved defective and injurious?

Moreover, your memorialists would call attention to the manifest inconsistency of military rule with a system of republican government like ours, and to the determined opposition which our ancestors manifested to its exercise over them by the King of Great Britain. It was made a special subject of complaint in the preamble to the Declaration of Independence that large bodies of armed troops were quartered among the colonists, and that the military was made independent of and superior to the civil power. Among the self-evident truths asserted in that declaration were these: "That all men are created equal, and that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." We are credibly informed that all the Indian tribes who have been granted an opportunity to express their sentiments on the proposed change have signified their decided objection to it, and have predicted that, if tried, it will operate to their serious disadvantage. To insist upon it under these circumstances would be a clear violation of the principles on which our Government is founded.

We believe the United States are bound by every consideration of religion, honor, and self-interest, to regard the welfare of the feeble remnants of the tribes who formerly occupied the whole breadth of our country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and who still retain a paramount right to a fair share of its territory. Regarding civil government as existing by divine appointment, we believe it can only be rightly administered so long as its accountability to the Most High is recognized, and the important fact remembered that it is "righteousness" alone that truly "exalteth a nation," while on the other hand, national sins, like those of individuals, are visited by just retribution. Representing, as the government of the United States does, a people professing Christianity, we feel that its position as such can only be consistently maintained as its general policy is in accordance with the benign precepts of the Gospel. It is true the Indian may be regarded as a somewhat incongruous element in our population, but while a knowledge of the arts of civilized life renders us his superior in many respects, that fact affords no warrant for our disregard of rights which are inherent in him. Still further should the injunctions of that holy religion which we profess forbid us to follow him with those deeds of violence and revenge which, in his savage ignorance, he has been taught to regard as virtues.

Our true policy as a people enlightened by the teachings of the Gospel should therefore manifestly be to extend to the Indian the same blessed influences which have thereby come to us; to gain his confidence by the strict performance of every promise; to secure to him and his children a suitable and permanent home; to instruct him as rapidly as his condition will permit in useful arts and modes of life; to surround him by wholesome moral influences; to shield him from the contaminating contact with unprincipled men of our own race; in short, both by example and precept to impress upon him the fact that the habits of civilized life and the religion which we profess are better than his own.

We look with feelings of sorrow and abhorrence on the great injustice and suffering that have repeatedly been inflicted upon the aborigines of this land, and we may rest assured that those who violate the rights of others and oppress those who are unable to protect themselves will sooner or later experience the truth of the Scripture declaration, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." It was the belief in this truth that led Thomas Jefferson to exclaim: "I tremble for my country when I remember that God is just and that His justice will not sleep forever!"

Let us, then, endeavor to atone, so far as we can, for past injustice toward the Indian race, for our breach of solemn treaties and the slaughter of their helpless women and children, by recognizing the obligations resting on a powerful people to protect and foster these weak and defenseless wards of the nation, and so fulfill the law of Christ, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

Taken from the minutes of a meeting of said representatives held in Philadelphia, first month, 6th, 1879.

JOSEPH WALTON, Clerk.

The SPEAKER. There is a large number of gentlemen who desire to have bills referred. To-day, under a suspension of the rules, is devoted to the consideration of bills reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. If the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] who is chairman of that committee, gives his consent, the Chair will recognize gentlemen who desire to introduce bills.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I suggest that half an hour be devoted for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests that half an hour be allowed for the introduction of bills for reference.

Mr. BURCHARD. I would suggest that the Committee of Ways and Means need the whole day.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of an objection.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I trust there will be no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. We had no morning hour on Monday of this week, and we have had no opportunity of introducing bills.

Mr. WOOD. I shall be willing to yield to gentlemen to introduce bills, but I will state that this is the first opportunity that the Committee of Ways and Means has had for reporting, and we expect to need all the time until half past four o'clock, and then have a recess for an evening session, and I do not feel that I am at liberty to yield.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, in obedience to the order of the House.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. Before the gentleman from New York proceeds, I ask to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 5534) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with amendments, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield for that purpose?

Mr. SPARKS. It is only that we may refer the bill to a committee.

Mr. WOOD. I will yield for that purpose.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table and, with the Senate amendments, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REFUNDING THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, in exchange for lawful money of the United States that may be presented for such exchange, certificates of deposit, of the denomination of $10, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, and convertible at any time, with accrued interest, into the 4 per cent. bonds described in the refunding act; and the money so received shall be applied only to the payment of the 5-20 bonds in the mode prescribed by said act, and he is authorized to prescribe suitable rules and regulations in conformity with this act.

Mr. KELLEY. By consent of the Committee of Ways and Means I desire to submit an amendment to this bill. I will state to the House that the committee have not authorized my amendment further than to consent that it may be offered and considered as pending.

Mr. WOOD. The committee consented that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] should offer his amendment. If he insists upon it, it will be submitted to a vote of the House. It is the individual act of the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself.

Mr. KELLEY. I have so stated to the Chair. If the Committee of Ways and Means consent that a vote may be taken upon it, the amendment will thus be disposed of. If not it will be my duty when the previous question is called to ask that it be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The remedy is with the House.

The amendment was, to strike out the words "at any time" after the word "convertible," and to insert after the words "accrued interest" the words "after six months into lawful money and at any time;" so that the bill will read, if amended:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, in exchange for lawful money of the United States that may be presented for such exchange, certificates of deposit of the denomination of $10, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, and convertible, with accrued interest, after six months into lawful money, and at any time into the 4 per cent. bonds described in the refunding act; and the money so received shall be applied only to the payment of the 5-20 bonds in the mode prescribed by said act, and he is authorized to prescribe suitable rules and regulations in conformity with this act.

Mr. WOOD. Before proceeding I desire to ask the House now to consent that in case the committee shall not have exhausted its reports there shall be a recess from half-past four until half-past seven this evening.

Mr. HALE. For the business of this committee alone?

Mr. WOOD. Exclusively.

Mr. EDEN. The session of this evening to be for purposes of legislation?

The SPEAKER. To-day has been assigned exclusively for consideration of reports from the Committee of Ways and Means. It is in the power of the majority of the House, of course, to take a recess at any time.

Mr. BURCHARD. Let that matter be decided now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] moves that the House take a recess from half-past four o'clock this afternoon until half-past seven o'clock this evening, for the purpose of continuing the consideration of reports from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. If I can get the attention of the House, I desire to call it especially to the very important bill now under consideration. It is a bill that introduces substantially a novel feature into the management of the affairs of our Government so far as the producing classes are concerned.

Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of deposit for as low a denomination as $10, and to receive the lawful money of the Government therefor, which certificates shall draw 3 per cent. per annum interest and be convertible at the pleasure of the holder into bonds of the United States bearing 4 per cent. interest. The money thus received is to be used exclusively for the purchase of the 5-20 bonds, which now draw 6 per cent. interest. This bill differs somewhat from the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury. He recommended a limitation of one year in which the certificates should be convertible, that the interest should be 3.65 per cent., and that United States notes or coin only should be received in payment for them. The committee thought that, inasmuch as there might be some doubts as to what constituted coin, anything that was "lawful money" should be received for these certificates, and that there should be no limitation as to the time in which the holders should be entitled to the bond, and that 3 per cent. was a more convenient rate of interest and sufficiently high for the objects in view.

The principal object of the Treasury in favoring this measure is that it will facilitate the refunding into 4 per cent. bonds of those now outstanding bearing 6 per cent. It will of course have this effect. I shall refer more fully, before I close, to this advantage and its benefits. I do not attach to them, however, the chief merits of this proposition. It has another, of far greater importance, which at this time should have much force with Congress. I refer to the issuing of certificates in so small a sum as $10, and thus affording to the poorer classes an opportunity to save beyond hazard or possible loss their surplus earnings. It will not only give a sure protection against loss, but secure the interest on the principal also, upon which they can for all future time confidently depend. We need not go far to find proofs of the necessity of some safer depository for the poor man's earnings than is now furnished by savings-banks. I am sure that every one has noticed the large number of failures of the savings-banks which have taken place within five years, and are yet occurring, and the consequent disasters to the poor people who had intrusted to them their small savings. Some of the largest of these institutions have made the most shameful exhibits of assets. As a general thing these institutions were organized for twofold purposes; ostensibly for philanthropic objects, but too frequently to give good salaries and employment to those who were intrusted with their management.

Though these persons were in the main highly esteemed citizens, in whom confidence should have been placed, yet experience shows that many of them were not strong enough in integrity to resist the opportunity of private speculation, nor of foregoing the advantages which the possession of large sums of other people's money gave them of individual profit.

The last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency furnishes some interesting statistics showing the total resources and liabilities of the savings-banks of the United States from 1874 to 1878. Some significant and pertinent facts may be gathered from these tables:

It will be seen that the aggregate deposits held by the savings-banks of the United States in 1877-'78 were $879,897,425. To secure these deposits these banks held aggregate nominal resources of $941,447,150; but when the nature of these resources is examined it will appear that more than two-thirds must necessarily be of doubtful value. As for instance $408,921,601 are loans upon real estate. Who can say of what real value these loans are? So far as the city of New York is concerned it is quite certain that if an attempt should be made to realize upon loans made upon real estate three or four years ago not over one-fifth of the amount loaned would be obtained. The tables from which I gather these figures state that of these resources are $88,192,337 of "loans on other securities." Who can tell how much would be returned of this if liquidation should be forced? Again, there are $170,155,076 of "State and other stocks and bonds," and about $100,000,000 equally uncertain in value. Thus it will be seen that it is altogether probable that of the $941,447,150 nominal resources, about $767,000,000 would, if forced upon the market for conversion, yield a much less sum in cash.

Now, if these depositors held the obligations of the Government no such contingency could exist. They would have absolute security, convertible at any moment into cash, with any addition which the accumulated interest earned would afford. This would not be the only advantage. Every holder of these certificates would become if possible a better citizen and more devoted to the unity and welfare of the Government. He would have a direct and practical impulse prompting his "love of country." Having thus become one of its creditors, he would feel the necessity of protecting its interests and of promoting its advantages and aiding in its success. There can be no question that one of the principal causes of the great wealth existing among the working classes of France has been in consequence of the opportunities afforded by the government for the safe deposit of their earnings in the rentes or funds.

Under the French system, the lowest obligation issued by the government is for one hundred francs—about $20; and nearly all the spare money of the producing classes finds this lodgment and no other. No losses happen to them. They feel encouraged to work and to save, which they do to an extent beyond any other persons of like condition on the globe. It is true there are other reasons which conduce to their prosperity. As a people, the French produce the luxuries which are of universal consumption, while they consume little of these themselves. They buy less and sell more than others; the surplus is hoarded, safely kept by the government, and used not only for its own necessities but for the benefit of those who have made it their depository—the custodian of their reliance in old age, sickness, or reverses. The statesmen of France comprehended the advantages of this system a century ago. Often has its wisdom been shown. No better illustration can be found of this fact than the late Franco-German war gave. At the close of that war France lay at the mercy of Germany, a conquered empire in possession of the enemy. She purchased her ransom by the payment of an exaction of a thousand million of dollars, which was demanded in coin, to be paid at once, without delay.

She did not murmur, hesitate, nor ask time for consideration. She called upon her own people for succor, and met the indemnity demanded promptly, not by borrowing of foreign governments or bankers, nor by syndicates, but by the subscription of her own people who came at once forward with their earnings and savings; the industrial classes being the chief contributors. A popular loan was inaugurated by the government, and the working men and peasantry drew from their hiding-places nearly the whole of the indemnity. French thrift, industry, and patriotism thus gave the government its freedom. The most astonishing feature in this home supply of such an immense sum, and most of it from the working class, is, that the industries had been paralyzed by the war, that the people had been subjected to a severe trial which had crippled their usual resources and caused widespread and general discouragement.

But though conquered, they were not subdued nor destitute. Their wages had been already largely invested in the rentes. Thousands of millions of francs had been before that stowed away in the safe-keeping of the government, and every Frenchman felt that all he had should follow, if only to save his previous investments. Thus it is that the debt of France is held by Frenchmen; it is distributed among the people; the government is the national savings-bank; and it is proverbial that of all Europeans the French are most attached to their own country, and most reluctant to give it up for any other. Now, why should not Americans go and do likewise? Why should we not make any sacrifice to instill love of country and national pride and unity and the general happiness and fraternity of the whole people under one government? I admit there is a difference in the peculiarities of Americans and Frenchmen, and that we cannot expect such great results as have been shown in France from the adoption of a like system here to that which I now propose. We are extravagant and speculative, fond of travel and adventure, and that hoarding of savings too frequently is wasted in seeking larger gains and a higher social position. Not so the Frenchman; he is closely economical; with few expensive personal wants; avoids speculation, and rarely emigrates, thinking no other country is equal to "La belle France."

We have already made considerable progress in the retention of our funded debt at home, and in its more general distribution among the people. The following highly instructive and suggestive facts are pertinent to this question. At my request, the Treasury Department has vouched for the accuracy of the figures, and they may therefore be accepted as official:

At last the Treasury officials have arrived at an approximate conclusion as to who are the takers and holders of the new loan. There are two classes of these bonds, coupon and registered. The following table gives the number, denomination, and amount of 4 per cent. registered bonds outstanding to date:

Denomination.	Number.	Amount.
$50	6,291	$314,550
100	27,552	2,755,200
500	13,090	6,545,000
1,000	21,806	21,806,000
5,000	3,698	18,490,000
10,000	4,732	47,320,000
20,000	202	4,040,000
50,000	564	28,200,000
Total		129,470,750

The following is the total amount, number, and denomination of coupon 4 per cent. bonds sold to date:

	Number.	Total.
$50 each	31,002	$1,550,100
100 each	93,067	9,306,700
500 each	20,314	10,157,000
1,000 each	31,653	31,653,000
Total		52,666,800

There is no way to ascertain how many holders these are distributed among. The best estimate that Treasury officials can make, however, is as follows:

Number of holders of $50 bonds	25,000
Number of holders of $100 bonds	75,000
Number of holders of $500 bonds	15,000
Number of holders of $1,000 bonds	25,000

So that it is probable that the $52,666,800 of the coupon bonds are held by 140,000 different individuals and corporations. This indicates a wide distribution.

The number and character of holders of registered bonds, however, can be ascertained from Treasury books and is as follows (up to time of payment of October interest:)

	Foreign.	Held by Treasury for national banks.	Held by individuals and corporations.	Total.
Holders of $50			228	228
Holders of $100	1		492	493
Holders of over $100 and not over $500	6	1	3,156	3,163
Holders of over $500 and not over $1,000	4		3,268	3,272
Holders of over $1,000 and not over $5,000	13	13	5,787	5,813
Holders of over $5,000 and not over $10,000	8	20	1,724	1,752
Holders of over $10,000 and not over $20,000	3	30	808	841
Holders of over $20,000 and not over $100,000	1	191	880	1,072
Holders of over $100,000		60	144	204
Totals	36	315	16,487	16,838

It will be observed that only thirty-six of these bonds are held by foreigners, while nearly seventeen thousand are held at home. This is the most striking illustration yet adduced to show how entirely the American debt is finding its way into American hands, thus keeping the money at home. It seems almost incredible that of nearly seventeen thousand bonds only thirty-six are held in foreign countries, but such is the fact.

We may therefore not accomplish all that the French have, with a people so much more fitted to the system, but with our greater energy, quickness, and facilities for the acquisition of gain we need it much more. The Government, therefore, should furnish it. One objection has been urged against the proposition to which I shall refer. It is that these certificates not being convertible into bonds before amounting to $50, which is the lowest United States bond issued, if the holder shall wish to use the money before having obtained that sum he will be forced to go to money-brokers with it and submit to a shave. There would be some force in this objection if the certificates bore no interest; but as they do bear interest from the day they are issued, and this interest is accumulating every day afterward, of course the certificate is enhancing in value all the while. If compelled to part with it the holder would of course get the benefit of its increased value, or at least suffer no loss. Another objection has been urged, namely, that these certificates could pass as currency. Well, suppose they do; what harm is done? who will suffer? Certainly not the Government, and certainly not the holder.

I am not alarmed lest some injury should be done by a free circulation of paper money. I prefer paper as a circulating medium if it is what on its face it purports to be, and am willing that the Government should furnish it if at the pleasure of the holders it is convertible into the universally recognized standard of value throughout the civilized world. I am ready to go further, and admit I should prefer that the Government should furnish such a circulating medium to the exclusion of all other authority to do so. The sole power to issue money should rest in the Government itself. I think it unwise to support a dual money-creating authority, especially when it may frequently happen that values may be unsettled in the differences which may possibly occur.

Another objection has been urged, that this system would not be successful in consequence of the want of confidence of the people in the Government itself, growing out of the interference of politicians, which endangers the public credit. There is no foundation for this fear. Our Government is one of the most stable in the world. If the people of France have confidence in a government like their own, which has vibrated between an imperial despotism and a licentious republic for the past one hundred years—having been a kingdom under a weak monarch, an empire under a despot, and a republic under a military chieftain, all within a half century—how much greater is the security offered in this country where not only our form of constitution but the theory, principles, and essence of our Government have been steadily and continuously maintained from the beginning? It is true there are men who would introduce wild schemes of finance and endanger the public credit, but the strong vigorous common sense of the people, the fountain from which all political power emanates, as it has in the past so it will in the future carry the nation onward in its regular and steady course, maintaining alike the public honor and the public faith.

Thus far I have referred only to the advantage of this bill, if it should become a law, to the poorer classes as a secure depository for their surplus earnings, and such others as choose to avail themselves of it. I shall now refer to the benefit it will confer upon the Government. One of the chief burdens which the people have had to labor under since the close of the war has been the high rate of interest which their obligations had to bear. This source of expenditure has borne a relation to the total expense of the Government truly alarming. The total ordinary expenditures of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1878, was $236,964,326.80, and of this aggregate there was paid for interest on the public debt $102,500,874.65 or nearly one-half. The estimated interest on the Government securities for the present fiscal year will be about $97,000,000. One of the principal causes for this enormous outlay is the high rate which the outstanding bonds now carry. An earnest effort is being made to call in the six percents and to replace them with four percents. Much progress has been made in this direction. About $100,000,000 has been thus refunded within a year. This bill will reach a new class of bondholders who have heretofore used the savings-banks and other methods of investments. If the whole amount of the present outstanding obligations or bonds now redeemable were converted into four percents, there would be a saving to the Government of near $9,000,000 a year in interest. This reduction of 2 per cent. in interest would be equal to one-third of the total sum paid for interest, which is at present about equal to one-third of the entire revenues of the Government.

This reduction in the expenditures would warrant a corresponding reduction in taxation, and to this extent would relieve the industries of a portion of their present onerous burdens. It is not necessary to argue in favor of any proposition which will tend to the accomplishment of this object. A judicious reduction of the public expenditures is at all times desirable, and needs no defense, especially when it is accomplished in a way which instead of affecting injuriously the industries of the people will promote them. I am sure every good citizen will cheerfully sustain it and support Congress in its enactment.

There are other advantages of lesser importance. The Secretary, under existing laws, is allowed to expend, in the work of refunding, ¼ of 1 per cent. I am glad to bear testimony to the fact that he has not exhausted this allowance, so far as the 4 per cent. bonds are concerned. The total amount of such bonds issued down to January 1 of this year was $203,585,450. One-half of 1 per cent. on this sum would be $1,017,927.25; whereas he officially states that the expense had been only $779,250.29, with $62,511.98 yet unpaid on that account, which will show a deduction of $176,164.98 from the ½ per cent. allowed by law. That portion of the debt which will be refunded through this agency will cost nothing except the expense of printing. This will be a saving to the Secretary of no inconsiderable sum. The power is given to the Secretary to provide rules and regulations to carry the act into effect. Much of the detail of the execution of the law must necessarily be left to him. He will, of course, use existing public officers throughout the United States as agents for the issuing of the certificates and for receiving and remitting the sums subscribed for them, and create such rules as will the better enable the people to reap the advantage of it and facilitate the refunding through this process.

With these remarks I submit the bill to the House, and will yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. How long does the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WOOD. How long does the gentleman require?

Mr. KELLEY. I shall require but a few minutes. I have no prepared remarks.

Mr. WOOD. I should like to have an understanding as to the time.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to accommodate the gentleman. I do not think I will take longer than the gentleman may think is proper.

Mr. WOOD. In justice to other gentlemen of the Committee of Ways and Means, I must ask the gentleman to name the time.

Mr. KELLEY. Say twenty minutes.

Mr. WOOD. How much time have I occupied?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-two minutes.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman from New York will allow me five minutes, rather to ask for some information on the subject than to make an argument of my own.

Mr. WOOD. The balance of the hour will be fairly divided.

Mr. STEELE. Is this debate to be confined to a few persons? If it is it is a disgrace to the legislation of the country.

Mr. BANKS. How much time remains?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-eight minutes remain of the hour of the gentleman from New York. But the debate is not necessarily confined to one hour nor is it necessarily confined to members of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope not.

The SPEAKER. The House has now entire control of the subject.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill is one of vast importance to the people of the country, especially to economical and thrifty poor people. It has been heralded to them as proposing a national savings-bank, a safe substitute for institutions such as those by which they have since 1872 lost so many tens of millions of dollars.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] speaking as chairman of the committee that reports the bill, tells us that it offers to this class of citizens a national savings-bank in which their funds will be safe. What are the objects of savings-banks? They are to accept small deposits from poor people, who have no means of preserving with safety their little surplus of earnings, and to give them therefor a low rate of interest in order that the funds thus confided to the bank may be loaned on securities that are absolutely safe. A savings-bank is a contrivance to enable the laboring people—men, women, and children—to lay by a small sum each week, each month, each quarter, or each year to provide for sickness, loss of employment, or any other calamity that may require them to draw upon or exhaust their savings.

The character of the deposits has been described in characterizing the objects of such banks. They come to the bank in driblets. There are dime savings-banks; there are dollar savings-banks; there are savings-banks that will not accept over $200 or $500 as a total deposit from one depositor. And then there are many speculative concerns that hold themselves out as savings-banks, and they have failed by the thousand, ruining those who had intrusted their savings to them. The very purpose of these depositors is to put their money where it will be safe, and where they can obtain it on demand or after certain specified notice, often ten days, sometimes two weeks, and in some States with an alternate right of requiring them to wait sixty days in case of a run. The principle of a savings-bank is safety and prompt return of deposits on conditions predetermined.

Examine this bill in view of these purposes of a savings-bank and you will find that the only provision which characterizes a savings-bank is that the Government will receive deposits as low as $10. There is no other. In this bill the United States Government proposes to engage the laboring people of the country in a game of chance, the law of which is to be "Heads it wins; tails they lose." No laboring-man can have benefit from an advance in the price of 4 per cent. bonds. These bonds are being issued at par, and will continue to be issued at par so long as there is a 5-20 or 10-40 bond to be exchanged. Suppose a laboring man or woman should be fortunate enough to get a 4 per cent. bond at $50, it cannot improve in value; for the Government competes with it by issuing 4 per cent. bonds at par. These bonds may fall below par in the market; and Government circles apprehend the possibility that they will go below par whenever business and enterprise shall revive. The New York Times of a date within the past week has admonished its readers of this possibility. The most conservative papers of the country present it not as a thing to be wished for, but as a thing possible and to be dreaded.

But, sir, this bill makes no provision for the payment of interest to the frugal man or woman who has loaned the Government $10, $20, $30, or $40. The only redemption it offers to people who deposit for temporary safety is a 4 per cent. bond to be converted into cash at the stock board. It is to turn this class of people who may be fortunate enough to be able to invest $10, $20, $30, $40, or $50 into game for the Shylocks that concentrate about the stock exchanges of the country. Look at the terms of the bill in regard to the ten-dollar certificates it proposes to issue. It reads thus:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue, in exchange for lawful money of the United States that may be presented for such exchange, certificates of deposit, of the denomination of $10, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, and convertible at any time, with accrued interest, into the 4 per cent. bonds described in the refunding act.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir; but if the gentleman will permit me I would rather pursue my argument without interruption.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well.

Mr. KELLEY. Now mark you, the holder of $10, $20, $30, or $40 is to be allowed accrued interest when he gets a bond; he is to receive none in the mean while. Now, the holder, the man or woman who has believed he or she could save $50, and under that belief invested $10, and then loses employment by any circumstance, sickness or other, will have the happy consciousness that if he or she cannot make up $40 more that by the mere accretion of 3 per cent. interest he or she can, at the end of one hundred and thirty-three years and four months, get back her or his deposit, and thenceforth be entitled to 4 per cent. interest. That is the only repayment of deposits proposed by the United States when it is about to open a savings-bank for its poor laboring people.

There is an alternative: the certificate may be sold. Oh, yes, and what will a ten-dollar certificate at 3 per cent. bring when a fifty-dollar bond at 4 per cent. payable quarterly can be had at par. Some philanthropist may buy from a sick servant or workingman the scrip and pay par for it; but the laws of trade will put these certificates away below par whenever they have to be sold on the market. Thrifty people who can get together $20 and no more may, if compelled to use their savings, take the risks of the market in an inland town or at the stock-board of a city or enjoy the happy consciousness that at the end of fifty years they will be entitled to a bond. This will be a very safe investment for the temporary deposits of the laboring poor! If $30 has been invested and the depositor shrinks from the loss involved in a sale in open market, he will be consoled by the consciousness that twenty-two and two-ninths years will bring about the day when the Government will refund his savings in a bond. With $40 invested the depositor must either take the risk of the stock-board or the village Shylock, or wait eight years and four months. This is the savings-bank to be offered to the laboring poor of America by their magnanimous and generous Government!

Mr. Speaker, my amendment proposes to remedy these hardships by striking from line 8 the words "at any time," and by the insertion of other words to make the clause read, "convertible with accrued interest after six months into lawful money, and at any time into the 4 per cent. bonds described in the refunding act."

This is a provision by which, if calamity overtakes a depositor, redemption may be had after six months, and 3 per cent. interest be allowed for the money while it had remained on deposit.

How does this bill treat wealthier citizens, those who can subscribe to 4 per cent. bonds as was done to the amount of $13,000,000 yesterday; $11,000,000 on another day, and $8,000,000 on still another. These poor people who are investing these millions of dollars are not to have 3, but to receive 4 per cent. They are not to be postponed for the collection of their interest one hundred and thirty-three years and four months, or fifty years, or twenty-two years, or even eight years, as the working-people may. They are to be paid 4 per cent. quarterly in coin.

I have shown what the bill offers the poor. Let us see what it offers banks and millionaires. Four per cent., payable quarterly, will double itself in seventeen and one-half years; 3 per cent. will double itself in thirty-three years and four months. "The poor we have always with us," and therefore we need not care about paying them their money or their interest. They are unworthy of consideration, useless appendages to a republic. There are but few rich, and we ought to take proper care of them; for without them and their capital and their enterprise the nation would go to the dogs. Do we not all know that they, few as they are, perform all the labor and produce all the wealth of the country? At least, is not such a fair inference from the provisions of this bill?

It will be observed that I use the language "lawful money" in my amendment. Gold is no longer merchandise; it is part of the lawful money of the country. When years ago I submitted a proposition kindred to this, it was said that I proposed a double back-action, interconvertible system by which bonds worth nothing should be issued and be redeemable in paper worth nothing. Sir, at that time the paper-paying bonds of the Government rated day by day and year by year higher than any coin-paying bonds of the Government. But now I propose that these certificates shall be convertible with accrued interest after the end of six months, by any unfortunate holder who cannot raise the full sum of $50 in gold, silver, or paper, the lawful money of the United States. Without this amendment the bill proposes a snare and a trap to the poor, and is in my judgment a disgrace to the Government. With it it will be safe for the people and beneficent in its effects upon the funding operations of the Government.

Mr. MILLS. Is it too late, Mr. Speaker, to make the point of order that this bill should receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is; but at any rate that point would not interfere with the consideration of the bill. To-day was assigned, under a suspension of the rules, for the consideration of bills from the Committee of Ways and Means, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] would have the right to move to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill in the same manner as the Committee for the District of Columbia have that privilege on the day assigned for the consideration of their business.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would not any member have the right to move to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. Any member recognized for that purpose would have that right.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to be recognized for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The floor at present is under the control of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. BANKS rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from New York has yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] There are eight minutes remaining of the hour of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BANKS. I shall occupy but a few minutes.

Mr. BURCHARD. I shall ask the Speaker for the floor at the expiration of the hour.

The SPEAKER. At the expiration of the hour, if the previous question is not demanded, or if, being demanded, it should not be sustained, the Chair would recognize the opponents of this bill, if there be such on the floor—first members of the Committee of Ways and Means who may be opposed to the bill, if there be any such, and then other members of the House.

Mr. BURCHARD. I oppose the bill so far as to desire to amend it.

The SPEAKER. That is opposing the report of the committee, of course.

Mr. SPRINGER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not a part of the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. It was allowed by the committee to be offered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from New York to allow this bill to go to the Committee of the Whole, where it can be thoroughly discussed. It is one of the most important measures that has been proposed in this House, and it ought not to be passed here under the previous question, with one hour for discussion, apportioned out by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The House has its remedy. The majority, if they think further discussion is desirable, have only to vote down the demand for the previous question after it has been made. Everything is within the control of the majority.

Mr. SPRINGER. I give notice, then, that at the proper time I will make that motion.

Mr. BRIGHT. Is this discussion going on in the morning hour, permit me to inquire?

The SPEAKER. There is no morning hour to-day.

Mr. BANKS. I trust this will not come out of the few minutes allowed me.

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to dissent from the general statements of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.] The principle of the bill of the committee as reported is undoubtedly a correct one. But what I wish to call attention to is the possible immediate effect of the operation of this measure upon one of the important interests of the country, affecting nearly all the States and very materially the country at large. There is no doubt the purchasers of these bonds will have good security, but it is not absolutely certain. I do not oppose the principle of the bill. On the contrary, if the chairman of the committee or other gentlemen can explain the subject to which I refer, I will cheerfully vote for it. Depreciation of property and the depression of the industries of the country do not arise from savings-banks. On the contrary, when any question is made in regard to our prosperity universal reference is made to the extent and number of deposits in savings-banks. They amount to many hundred thousand in number, to millions even, and their deposits are over $850,000,000. I am told the depositors number two millions or more. Their liabilities are nine millions and a half.

The law describes and limits securities to be taken for loans from savings-banks and for the money of depositors. They are not allowed to take whatever securities they may please, but the law specifies what securities shall be taken. The securities accepted are those required by law; therefore, as the gentleman has stated, and correctly, no doubt, there are liabilities of real estate alone to nearly $500,000,000. He has stated, further, with a reasonable degree of accuracy, that the depreciation in real estate is one-half its value, and in some instances more than that. If, then, this bill shall go into operation, the inevitable first effect of it will be to induce depositors to withdraw their deposits from the savings-banks, and consequently the very next effect will be inevitably to induce persons having money to invest to make that deposit with the United States in the shape of these bonds rather than with the savings-banks. This will compel the savings-banks to call in their loans and foreclose the mortgages given to them, and foreclosure of those mortgages will throw real estate upon the market and produce still greater depreciation of property and business.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman permit me to remind him that these securities of deposit bear but 3 per cent. interest, while on the contrary savings-banks allow 5 per cent., and that where savings-banks are solvent and retain the confidence of their depositors, it is not natural to believe they will give up 5 per cent. interest and take 3 per cent. interest. This bill, therefore, would not inflict any damage of the kind suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts upon any solvent savings-bank in the country.

Mr. BANKS. I was about to notice that myself. The interest proposed by this bill upon the bonds to be issued under it is 3 per cent. The savings-banks pay, as the gentleman has suggested, 5 per cent. in some instances, but frequently not more than 4 per cent. Gentlemen sitting around me say that in the States they represent they pay but 4 per cent. But suppose it to be 5 per cent, as the gentleman has stated. The effect of the bill will be to take from the savings-banks the additional deposits which might be made upon which the banks must rely to meet increased liabilities and withdraw to a considerable extent the money already deposited in the savings-banks, and the mortgages on real estate held as securities will be foreclosed, and the real estate suddenly put upon the market at this time amounting to $500,000,000 and more would of course depress the securities of every savings-bank in the country, and possibly deprive them of the power to pay any considerable proportion, or at least the whole of the amount of the deposits called for.

The gentleman has stated that the number of persons investing in the bonds of the country amount to over sixteen thousand. Undoubtedly that number will be largely increased. Generally they are capitalists, while depositors in savings-banks belong to the poor people of the country, and their deposits are made in small sums. The bank for which I am speaking, on the representation made to me, receives five-cent deposits. It is incorporated for that very purpose, and bears that name. There are a multitude of depositors, and I am assured by the officers of that institution that if the Government shall pursue this course at this time it will be impossible for them to realize upon their securities or to pay their depositors.

Now, I do not oppose the principle of this bill; if the circumstances of the country were now as they were in England and France when the same principle was established there, I should make no opposition to it. I only ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and other members of the House to the facts that I have stated, hoping that they will be better able to give a definite and satisfactory answer upon these points than I have been.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] has expired.

Mr. WOOD. Then if the House will give me the previous question I will divide my closing hour with other gentlemen who desire to be heard.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the House will vote down the previous question. I will then move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will lose nothing by allowing the debate to continue. The Chair will recognize the suggestion of the committee whenever the House or the gentleman himself desires to test the sense of the House upon the question of closing debate, so that he may move the previous question.

Mr. WOOD. I have no wish to deprive any gentleman of an opportunity of discussing the bill; but if the motion of the gentleman from Illinois shall prevail of course it means that the bill will go over for this session.

The SPEAKER. The House might wish to discuss this bill in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair does not entirely recognize that as an adverse vote. The House may desire to consider it either in the House itself or in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not desire at all to delay the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the purpose of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WOOD. I wish the bill disposed of to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already decided that it is competent for a motion to be made to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider this bill to-day, and when the House goes into committee this bill will of necessity be considered.

Mr. BURCHARD. Is it now too late to make a motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair has so decided, but the Chair has not decided that it is too late for the House to have an opportunity, by a majority vote, to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and if there should be an adverse vote upon the demand for the previous question that motion would be in order.

Mr. MILLS. But the gentleman from New York will not permit that motion to be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] has not the floor; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] has it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has the time of the gentleman from New York expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. SPRINGER. I asked the Chair to recognize me at the end of his hour to make this motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair under the practice of the House recognizes the members of the committee who reported the bill. If time is allowed the Chair will then recognize gentlemen outside of the committee.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to understand whether the Speaker has decided that I have lost control of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not lost control of the bill, because the Chair will recognize him to demand the previous question whenever he wishes to do so under the rule.

LATE HON. B. B. DOUGLAS.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] to yield to me to make a motion touching the payment of the salary of a late member.

Mr. BURCHARD. I will do so if it can be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks nobody will object.

Mr. HUNTON. If anybody objects I will withdraw the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to include in the sundry civil appropriation bill an item appropriating a sum sufficient to pay the three children of Hon. B. B. Douglas, late a Representative from the State of Virginia, the amount he would have received for the residue of the term for which he was elected.

There was no objection, and the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REFUNDING THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask when the gentleman from New York designs to move the previous question upon this bill, so that we may know what to expect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the object of the gentleman from Illinois is to have general debate or a lengthy debate upon this bill. The time of the gentleman from New York expired. The Chair then recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] who is in opposition to the bill as reported. As soon as the committee shall cease to occupy the floor, the Chair will recoguize, as is the practice, members outside of the committee.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I think that this bill is not objectionable so far as it goes. I should prefer in its place a measure already reported by the Committee of Ways and Means and which is on the Calendar, a measure which obviates all the objections so earnestly urged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

This bill of a single section is intended to encourage refunding by issuing certificates of deposit, in the hope that investors will purchase certificates of $10 each, drawing the low rate of interest of 3 per cent., which certificates will ultimately be merged into and become 4 per cent. bonds.

Now, the argument urged in favor of this measure is that there is a class of investors—the poor and saving, the economical and industrious—who desire to invest their savings in Government securities, and to make the investment in amounts less than the minimum now authorized by law, which is $50. This measure is designed to facilitate the refunding of the debt by authorizing the issue of 3 per cent. certificates of deposit and their conversion into 4 per cent. bonds, the money paid for the certificates of deposit being used in the redemption of the outstanding 6 per cent. bonds. So far, I believe, it is a desirable measure.

Under the rules and regulations that are provided in the latter part of this bill, as I am informed, the Secretary of the Treasury holds that money can be forwarded in post-office money-orders to the Treasurer of the United States, and he can collect the money from the Post-Office Department, and thus we will have all the advantages of the money-order system which are provided for in the other bill to which I have alluded.

There is, however, an additional feature in that bill which I think should be provided by Congress. I think there is no more important measure that has been presented to this Congress than that one. It is much more simple than the systems which have been adopted by other governments.

In 1861, Great Britain adopted a system by means of which the poor and the frugal who desired to invest their savings in government securities could utilize the postal service for the purpose of forwarding their money to the treasury, and they could be repaid through the post-offices of that country their deposits or any portion. The full system of postal savings-banks was established at that time in Great Britain. I submit a statement showing the increase of savings deposits in post-office and ordinary savings-banks in Great Britain and Ireland from 1862 to the latest parliamentary returns accessible—the year 1877.

Deposits of British savings-banks, 1863 to 1877.

1863	$16,884,140	$204,757,525	$221,641,665
1864	24,965,620	197,601,680	222,567,300
1865	32,632,000	193,726,490	226,358,490
1866	40,605,875	181,910,580	222,516,455
1867	48,749,645	182,666,015	231,415,660
1868	58,333,275	184,337,285	242,670,560
1869	67,621,045	187,768,730	255,389,775
1870	75,495,520	189,792,745	265,288,265
1871	85,125,020	194,098,315	279,223,335
1872	99,591,695	200,441,740	297,033,435
1873	105,838,745	202,500,675	308,339,420
1874	115,787,345	207,529,745	323,317,090
1875	125,936,725	212,038,845	337,945,570
1876	134,982,750	216,417,850	351,400,600
1877	143,703,785	221,193,430	214,897,205

The deposits in the British postal savings-banks are in effect deposits in the treasury. The government receives, credits, and repays the depositor at the post-offices designated for that purpose. There were 301 of them in 1863 and 5,480 in 1877.

Now, it is unnecessary to provide post-office banks on that system for the purpose of utilizing and gathering the savings of the poor for the purpose of refunding the debt. It is unnecessary that in every town where there is a money-order office the postmaster should be authorized to receive and keep an account of the moneys so deposited, entering upon the books the names of the depositors, and allowing them to draw their money at that office. We can simply adopt a system by means of which, through the money-order offices, the money of these investors can be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States, to be entered on the books of the Treasury, there to remain to the credit of the depositor, drawing a low rate of interest and convertible into 4 per cent. bonds, and when paid to be paid through the money-order system or by a Treasury draft. The system is practicable and desirable.

This Government owes $2,000,000,000. It has borrowed from the people of this country and of foreign countries some $1,800,000,000, represented by our bonded debt. The people of the United States have in their banks, savings, national, public, and private, over $2,000,000,000. In the savings-banks of a dozen States they have nearly $900,000,000; $843,000,000 in less than one-third of the States of this Union.

The people have the capital to loan; the Government desires to borrow. On the 1st of this month it was paying 6 per cent. interest on $657,846,200, and 5 per cent. on $703,266,650. The capitalists are offering at this time to loan at 4 per cent. as their 6 per cent. bonds mature and are called for payment by the Secretary. But thousands of the poor would loan their savings if our Government would receive them.

The savings deposits of Great Britain are all invested in her consols except a comparatively small sum, not much more than $1,000,000, retained as balances in the post-office banks to meet withdrawal demands. If the people should deposit under this proposition $100,000,000 in the United States Treasury not 5 per cent. need be reserved from investment and immediate use in the redemption of 6 per cent. bonds.

Now we can adopt this system without jeopardizing the savings-banks of the country, because a rate of interest is proposed lower than that paid by the savings-banks. In the postal savings-bank system in Great Britain the rate of interest is placed at 2½ per cent.; the interest paid by the savings-banks is 3½ per cent. We find in the history of that system since 1861 that the savings-bank deposits remain substantially as they were, while the deposits under the postal saving system have increased from nothing in 1862 to $143,000,000 in 1877. During the same period the deposits in the savings-banks have increased from $200,000,000 up to $221,000,000. The postal saving system in Great Britain, although so widely and conveniently extended to every important post-office, has not injured the savings-banks of that country by diminishing their deposits, but they continue not only to hold their deposits but to increase the amount. Those who are interested in the savings-banks of this country, the officers of those banks, the trustees and representatives of those institutions, need not fear that this system will jeopardize or injure them, or only such of them as are rotten and ought to die speedily.

Why should we not adopt some such system? Two-thirds of the States of this Union practically have no savings-banks. A system inviting and affording facilities for the people to intrust their savings to the care of the Government would induce habits of thrift and economy. The people are anxious to do this. Wherever this subject has been agitated the people are asking for some such system. Why should not Congress adopt it? Because in a few States there are other systems which it is feared even this low rate of interest will injure, shall we hesitate to legislate for the benefit of the people? A ten-dollar certificate of deposit is but little better as an investment for savings than a ten-dollar note. The whole value of the savings system consists in the fact that the savings, to a certain extent, are placed beyond the reach of the depositors for immediate use.

If a man has a ten-dollar bill and a desire or temptation comes to him to spend the money, he can spend it. That is one reason why a man who wants to save his money puts it into a savings-bank or some place where it is beyond his immediate control. It is there for safe-keeping for himself and from himself for the time being.

Now, if he puts his money into a 3 per cent. certificate, convertible as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] proposes at any time into legal-tender notes, that certificate will readily pass as money, and the holder of it can spend it just as well as he could spend a ten-dollar bill.

If the money is put into a savings-bank, then the depositor must take his book to the bank or draw a check for the money. That takes time, and often the temptation passes and the depositor leaves his money in the bank. If the money is deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and it takes some days or a week for the depositor to obtain it, he will probably allow it to remain there undisturbed.

Now let us have what is equivalent to a savings system, instead of these certificates of deposit. If amendments are to be offered to this bill, I desire to offer one in the form of a section that will allow such a system to be adopted. I would prefer that the bill should pass, with some such amendment. Without such a provision, I think this is but a half-way measure in aid of refunding.

I did not oppose this bill in committee, but consented that it should be reported to the House, instead of insisting that we should proceed to consider the savings-deposit bill already reported. That bill is now on the Calendar, is a special order, in charge of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS,] and I understand that the friends of the bill desire that it shall be called up at an early day, and brought before the House for consideration.

I do not desire at this time to occupy the attention of the House any longer in discussing that measure. I will merely say that I desire additional legislation upon this subject, either by way of amendment to this bill or by considering the bill which has already been reported.

I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER. I should not have troubled the House on this matter did I not deem this bill a delusion and a snare. What is the proposition? It is that the poor man who has $10 surplus each month may go to some depository of the Government, I do not know where, and spend the day in obtaining with his $10 of money a ten-dollar certificate of deposit. This he may do every month for five months, and then he can put his $50 of certificates of deposit into a 4 per cent. bond. During that time he will receive as his interest on the certificates of deposit the sum of thirty-four and one-half cents. He will have spent five days or parts of five days in doing that, and when he gets it done he will have the privilege of buying a fifty-dollar 4 per cent. bond. If he would only keep his money in his pocket-book and continue at work he would at the end of five months have the same privilege without having lost time in running about hunting up public depositories. That is all there is in this bill.

It is said that the object is safety. How is this certificate of deposit for $10 any more safe than a ten-dollar bill? If the depositor loses it, it is gone. This system has no element of a savings-bank in it. It does not afford any safety. It does not provide for any payment of accrued interest. After getting your certificate of deposit, if you require the money, you can get a broker to sell it for you at a shave greater than the whole interest. That is all there is in the bill. If there is anything more I fail to find it; and I should like to have some gentleman of the Committee of Ways and Means tell me what more there is in it.

But it is said, "Oh! we are going to do something for the poor people;" and my friend from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] has likened this proposed system to the governmental savings-bank system of England. But mark the difference. The governmental savings-bank of England pays 2¼ per cent. interest, while the ordinary discount of the Bank of England is 2½ per cent. Therefore there is some boon to the laborer. But here the ordinary rate of discount is from 7 per cent. to 10 and 12 per cent., according to the locality. What boon is it to the poor man to give him the right to get 3 per cent. interest on his deposit—less than half the lowest rate of discount anywhere in this country? Put the rate up to 7 per cent. for six months, and I will talk with you. Give the same chance to the poor man that you give to the bank.

Under this system you propose to gather the deposits of the people, the greenbacks, into the Treasury of the United States—for what purpose? There is no way of paying them out. The current receipts of the Government must be equal to its current expenditures; and this surplus fund which gets into the Treasury cannot get out so far as I can understand, whatever laws you may pass. Thus you continue still further the contraction of the currency which has already depressed labor, stopped business, and brought the country to its present condition. This is said to be a necessary condition; and we are told that we have this great and Heaven-born boon of resumption as the result—resumption at New York and nowhere else! You will not let a man get $10 of your gold; he must have accumulated $50 before he can get either a 4 per cent. bond or any gold.

Why not say that these 4 per cent. bonds shall be issued in the form of ten-dollar registered bonds? Why go through this circumlocution for the simple purpose (and in my humble judgment this measure originates in that purpose) of getting rid of the greenbacks—getting them locked up. Therefore I cannot vote for this bill. If I understand anything of the interests of the people, it will do them no good. It can do them no good. It might possibly injure the savings-banks if it were possible to have any large operations under this bill.

When your poor man has put his first $10 or his second $10 into one of these certificates what shall he do with it in case he is under the necessity of using the money? If he puts the amount in the savings-bank he can go and draw it out and use it; but with this certificate he must go to a broker and submit to a shave, and the shave of that particular broker too. All that he can possibly get if he accumulates $10 a month for five months is thirty-four cents interest, and this he secures by going five times and buying five of these certificates.

Mr. PEDDIE. The storekeepers will take them in trade.

Mr. BUTLER. If you want to do anything in this direction I am in favor of a postal savings-bank of the Government, allowing interest on deposits as high as any interest the Government pays, deducting a small percentage for the expenses of doing the business. That is what we want, South and West and East and North.

Let the rate of interest be 6 per cent. if you please, as long as the Government pays 6 per cent. interest to other creditors. To whom on earth should the Government pay interest rather than the poor laborer, to encourage him in making savings? Who on earth should have the preference over him? You pay 6 per cent. interest to one class; you give a special privilege to the banks and allow them to make 8 and 10 and 15 per cent.—never less than 7. And now you undertake to demagogue this question of the savings of the people by offering them 3 per cent., these 3 per cent. certificates being convertible when they reach the amount of $50 into a 4 per cent. bond, which may or may not be worth all its face imports, which never can be worth any more, and may at any time be worth less. Is the House prepared for such a measure? If you are going to pass the bill at all the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] should certainly be adopted. That amendment provides simply that a man after making his deposit may go and get his money again, if he does not like the security. This is exactly what he can do at the savings-bank. But one principal objection to this whole measure is the want of safety. The holder of the certificate of deposit may be robbed of it at any time; he may lose it by accident; it may be burnt up; and then his money is gone.

Mr. KELLEY. Is not the case the same if the depositor loses his savings-bank book?

Mr. BUTLER. By no manner of means; not in our portion of the country; I do not know how it may be elsewhere. With us every savings-bank book is registered; means are taken for the identification of the depositor by handwriting and otherwise; and if his book is lost he can still get his money by giving an indemnity bond in the same way as is required in the case of United States registered bonds which are lost or destroyed. Under this bill when a certificate has been lost the money is gone forever; but under a postal savings-bank system the deposit would be registered; the voucher might be transferred according to proper forms, and the assignee could get his money. The poor man, if his voucher should be lost, could get his money as well as the Manhattan Savings-Bank. Perhaps, if necessary, we would pass a bill to facilitate the operation, though possibly that is doubtful.

For the reasons I have stated I am heart and soul, body and mind, opposed to this bill.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman vote for my amendment?

Mr. BUTLER. I will vote for the amendment, because the man who deposits his money and gets a ten-dollar certificate would, under the amendment, be no worse off than if he had a ten-dollar bill. He could get his money at any time, and by waiting six months he could get it converted into a bond.

On the 12th of February, 1869, I proposed to this House the convertible system. My speech is on record, and I have never had occasion to go back on it. I stand by it still.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURCHARD. I yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker, this proposition originates in the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury contained in his annual report. That clause of the report is headed by the word "savings," and undoubtedly the intention of the Secretary was to recommend a system to Congress by which the savings of the poor might be converted into Government bonds. Incidentally no doubt he expected to assist the refunding system.

Now, I am in favor of a well-digested postal savings-bank. I agree with all that has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] and by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] as to the desirable nature of such an institution as that in the framework of our Government. I hold that it is due to the laborer to give him a place of absolute certainty for the deposit of his earnings and his savings. But I need not take one moment of time to show this proposition submitted by the Committee of Ways and Means is not such an institution as will protect or give any facility indeed for a poor man to save his earnings. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] have shown how utterly baseless it is to call this a provision for the savings of the poor. A man might as well keep his $10 in the form of a bank bill, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has said, as to put it in the form of one of these certificates.

A loss of one of these certificates would be equivalent to the loss of a ten-dollar bill, for it is not to be supposed that a poor man can by any process take the measures instituted for the recovery of his loss. And I was glad to hear some one put to the gentleman from Massachusetts the question as to the savings-banks books. When a savings-bank book is lost it does not require even a bond as the gentleman from Massachusetts has said to get a new one. In order to test that matter I myself lost a book purposely, as I wished to see whether there was any hardship on the poor. I lost my book and went to the bank and asked for a new one. They first made me write my signature and identify it. They asked from me an affidavit, they asked me to identify myself; all of which I did with very considerable trouble, for it cost me two hours to find a man who knew me, but nevertheless I succeeded in doing it. [Laughter.] I received and have in my possession now a new book without any other than the ordinary trouble necessary to prove a loss.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] proposes to remedy this difficulty which he makes so clear, that this is not a savings-bank, by an amendment which would give the right to the depositor to get his money back after six months with 3 per cent. interest. I am sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not have made that suggestion if he had known what will necessarily be the effect of it. It is a proposition to give to the rich men with large sums of money 3 per cent. interest on deposits with the Government for six months, and that is all it amounts to. I state to this House that for the last four years there have been many millions of dollars on deposit in trust companies in the city of New York at less than 3 per cent. interest. I know of large sums lying there at 2½ per cent., and the owners will be glad to stipulate to let them lie for six months if they can get 3 per cent. interest. If this amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall pass, they will certainly walk to the subtreasury, deposit their money, take out these ten-dollar certificates—it is as good as any other form—and at the end of six months go back and draw 3 per cent. interest, and must, therefore, keep the cash on hand so that it cannot be invested in bonds.

The Chair is about to rap me down, and I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me for ten minutes.

Mr. BURCHARD. I will yield to the gentleman from New York five minutes longer.

Mr. BUCKNER. Let me ask the gentleman from New York whether that would not be a good operation for the Government, if it can take up 5 and 6 per cent. bonds and retire them?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It would be if it did not have to pay it back at the end of six months. The gentleman from Pennsylvania provides the money shall be paid back. If the money be put in 6 per cent. bonds how are you going to get it out of the 6 per cent. bonds and pay back these deposits? The thing is impossible, and the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entirely impracticable.

But, Mr. Speaker, if this were ever so much a savings-bank, I should be utterly and absolutely opposed to it for another reason which to my mind is insuperable. The money which is to be received from these ten-dollar depositors is to be used according to the provisions of the refunding act. What are the provisions of the refunding act? That when the money is deposited in the Treasury three months' notice shall be given for the call of the 5-20 bonds. Now, then, when this money is aggregated together it is going to lie for three months somewhere and the Government is going to pay 3 per cent. interest on it, and also during the three months pending the call it is going to pay 6 per cent. upon the called bonds. Where will this money be in the interval? Where is it now on the called bonds? I hold in my hand, in the RECORD of the 21st of December, the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in which he reports that on October 1, 1878, there were sixty-four millions of public money on deposit without interest in the national banks. This money, gathered up in sums of $10 from the poor people of this country, is to go into the public depositories in the same manner as the money received for the 4 per cent. bonds and it is to lie there three months idle; and these banks which have made over a million of dollars in double interest in the last year under the funding system, are to get 1½ per cent. more interest for three months out of the savings of the people of this country.

The process is very simple. The money will be deposited in the banks; the banks will use it in buying the 6 per cent. bonds, which, under the regulations of the Treasury, are accepted as collateral security; these bonds draw interest for three months, amounting to 1½ per cent., and are then surrendered either as called bonds or exchanged for them with the holders when they are presented for payment. The people pay interest on both the deposits and the bonds; the depositor gets ¾ of 1 per cent. and the national bank gets 1½ per cent.; and this is called justice to the poor and an aid to refunding.

Mr. Speaker, I am a zealous, earnest advocate for resumption. I trust there are many in this House as earnest as I am, but I claim there are none more earnest. I am equally earnest for the refunding of the national debt at a lower rate of interest in order to relieve the pressure of taxation. I believe in the policy, and I would believe in the practice if I did not find it every time so arranged as to build up the profits of certain national banks which hold the public funds. I acquit the committee, cheerfully, of any complicity in this transaction. I know it never occurred to them to suppose that this money was to lie idle and that the Government was to continue to pay 1½ per cent. interest on it, on the bonds which it is intended to redeem. But that objection, it seems to me, is absolutely fatal to this bill in its present form. Its efficiency as a savings-bank has been shown to be a delusion, but its efficiency as a means of taking 1½ per cent. interest out of the Treasury of this people and putting it into the treasury of certain national banks which hold the Government deposits is as clear as noonday, and I cannot support the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURCHARD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. On general principles it is my opinion that the less legislation we have on financial questions, in the present situation of the country, the better. We are getting on well; and I would not, just now, favor any radical change in the present order of our currency laws. But here is a proposition more misunderstood, I think, than any I have ever heard discussed for the same length of time, as is shown by two or three speeches that have been made during the last half hour.

Let us get at the situation. The Secretary of the Treasury is by law authorized and directed to refund the 6 per cent. interest-bearing bonds of the United States into four percents. Every time he makes a refund of $1 he lightens the annual burden of coin interest paid by the people to the amount of two cents.

We have a very considerable number of the 6 per cent. bonds still out, but at a rate wholly unparalleled in the history of this country they are being refunded into four percents. At first it was the custom of the Treasury to accomplish that through a syndicate; but there was much feeling throughout the country that it allowed a small group of people to have all the advantages of the business of refunding. The present Secretary of the Treasury abandoned the syndicate plan, and invited all the national banks of the United States, at least all the depository banks, to take hold of the work and aid him in the transfer of the six percents into four percents without the help of the syndicate. Several of the banks took hold of it, and, the plan having a broader basis than the syndicate, the refunding has been going on more rapidly. Instead of a syndicate of a few people, it was done by all the banks that were willing to help, and these banks were acting as agents of their customers to take bonds. When a bank takes a million of 4 per cent. bonds, it takes them for its customers; and in that way the refunding is going on, through the agency of the banks, by the people.

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury, while he has saved considerably by this method and has rapidly hastened the work of refunding, finds or believes he can save more and make the refunding more rapid still if he can broaden the basis still further by going beyond the banks and dealing directly with the people. He proposes that, in order to do this thing, he shall be authorized to permit private citizens to come in with savings of $10 each, or any multiple of $10, and place them in his custody to be entered as loans to the Government, on which they shall receive 3 per cent. interest until such time as their subscriptions shall amount to $50, when they will be transferred into 4 per cent. bonds. It is simply a measure to invite the co-operation of men of small means in the work of funding.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Why not allow on the small deposit 4 per cent. as well as on the large one?

Mr. GARFIELD. For the reason that there would then be no motive to go on and put it into 4 per cent. bonds. This is not a savings-bank bill. When the time comes to discuss the question of a postal savings-bank, I may want to say something on that subject. But this is not a proposal to convert the Treasury into a savings-bank. It is a proposal to facilitate and hasten the refunding of our 6 per cent. into 4 per cent. bonds, and for no other reason.

Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] puts a savings-bank feature into it, but it is not broad enough to cover that subject; it takes away altogether the motive and defeats the purpose of refunding.

Mr. KELLEY. I would ask the gentleman if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means did not distinctly announce that this was to furnish the people of the United States national savings-banks?

Mr. WOOD. Let me answer the gentleman. I did not state it in that sense. In speaking of the French system I said that the effect and object would be to make this in one sense a national institution for the savings and earnings of the people.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is so to this extent, that in many sections of the country the savings-banks have broken down; the people have lost confidence in them, and in lieu of placing their funds in savings-banks, which they cannot trust, the Secretary of the Treasury believes and I believe that if they were allowed to do it they will place their savings where they will be invested in 4 per cent. bonds.

Now, here is a way to hasten refunding, without the aid of a syndicate; without the aid of the banks; and without the cost of ¼ per cent. commission, which we now pay, as the means of doing that without changing any of our laws whatever, except simply allowing a man to deposit $10 at a time until his deposits amount reaches $50. I believe it will be most efficacious.

Mr. KELLEY. Where?

Mr. GARFIELD. Wherever they cannot trust the savings-banks, in the Treasury of the United States. By postal money-orders addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, and from the postal money-order offices in the United States, or through the banks, without cost, citizens can send their orders under regulations to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and transfer their gains to this national loan.

The gentleman from Massachusetts sees trouble in this project. He says that this is a scheme for the contraction of the currency. Why, sir, does not the gentleman know that this is a plan for paying out every dollar put in, and buying up the 6 per cent. bonds, so that all the money paid in this way will find its way immediately to the people in the purchase of 6 per cent. bonds. If he can find contraction in that he must have a microscope of a higher power than any I have ever seen.

Again, he says that this is going to distress the poor man. I have more faith in the poor man than the gentleman seems to have. If a man believes that he can in a few months save $50, I am willing to trust him that he can do it. When he puts in a ten-dollar deposit I believe that he has enough character to follow it by another and another, until he becomes the owner of a 4 per cent. bond of the United States.

Reference has been made to France. One of the great elements of strength of public credit in France is because five millions of Frenchmen hold the bonds of France, and the day when three million American laborers are the holders of bonds of the United States will be the day when the occupation of these gentlemen who try to raise a storm in this country between the bondholder and the poor people will be gone, and the strength of our public faith will be established, and there will be a death to demagoguery, and for no other reason than that the people of this country will become interested in the public debt of the United States. A man that holds a fifty-dollar bond will not stand much nonsense about repudiation of the public debt. It is a great measure of protection of the public credit. It will hasten the day of the refunding of our debt.

Mr. Speaker, if we want to help the business of this country, we should aid the United States to get out of the way as a great competitor for loans. While the United States is paying 6 per cent., no private citizen can get a loan for less than 6 per cent., or as low as 6 per cent. When the United States gets its debt re-funded down to 4 per cent., then it has substantially got out of the way as a competitor for the loans of private persons, and the sooner we can do that the sooner we shall get out of the way of the industry and business of this country.

Now, if the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] be adopted we simply make this, in a small and imperfect way, a savings-bank bill, and the Government must take and hold a large volume of money and be ready on call to pay again what has been deposited; but, on the contrary, if the bill is allowed to stand as it is reported by the committee, the Government can use every dollar deposited as soon as it comes into the Treasury to buy up the 6 per cent. bonds.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. On three months' notice.

Mr. BURCHARD. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. BURCHARD. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Committee of Ways and Means should have come before this House with a measure of such importance as this, proposing to move the previous question so as to cut off all amendments or debate. The Committee of Ways and Means has this privilege, but I do not think it should be so permitted to exercise it. I do not believe that a measure of such magnitude can be properly considered save in Committee of the Whole. There are other measures which this antagonizes which may be offered, and the members ought to have the right to vote on them. This bill is a mere skeleton, to be filled up by the Secretary of the Treasury. The necessity for amending it appears in every line of it, and yet it is a proposition against which, almost in any shape, members are reluctant to vote.

There are three bills upon our Calendar waiting in their order to be reached, which after great labor were matured by three separate committees, providing postal savings-banks or savings-banks for the people. One bill was reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WADDELL;] another was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means by another gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS,] and one was reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency by him who is now addressing the House. Those bills meet the case more fully than either of the propositions now before the House. One of them is a proposition for a popular loan, and the other two carefully matured bills for postal savings-banks.

What is the proposition which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. WOOD] and the majority of the members of that committee ask this House to support? They propose this as a popular loan, offering the people a lower rate of interest than the Government has ever paid. To-day we are paying 5 and 6 per cent. interest, and are boasting because we have been able to float a loan at 4 per cent. Now they propose offering on this people's loan only 3 per cent. They provide no means by which the people can get back the money they will have thus deposited. The only mode by which buyers of these certificates can get back their money will be to sell them to any broker or shaver, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has said.

I do not think any proposition could be made so inevitably barren of all useful results as this proposition. A ten-dollar 4 per cent. bond would have been better. Even a 3 per cent. bond. It does not give the people a postal savings-bank. It does not give them an interest-bearing bond. It is a certificate that is not convertible. When a number of them are aggregated they can be converted into 4 per cent. bonds. That process cannot be said to be devised for the people. But the worst of it is that it increases the already too great powers of the Secretary of the Treasury. He is to make the regulations to carry out the bill, which scarcely contains a restriction on this exercise of power. This may enable bankers to hold their reserves in these certificates, for they can convert them, but it is in no just sense a popular measure. I am sure that this House desires to do something in this direction. I am sure the country expects it of us. Each member will be reluctant to vote against any proposition for a popular loan, no matter how defective, but surely the country had a right to expect something better than this. Again, this bill provides no means by which the people can obtain the interest to be paid upon these certificates of deposit. Such interest must and can only be paid when the certificates are ultimately paid, or be computed when the certificates are converted into bonds. The interest on Government bonds is payable semi-annually; but there is no provision in this bill for the payment of any interest upon the certificates of deposit semi-annually or at any regular period.

Every member of this House very well knows that upon the old compound-interest notes the people obtained no interest; the banks who bought them obtained it all. Those old twenty-dollar bills floated as money merely until bankers found that the interest was worth more than its value as circulation, when bankers and brokers held them.

In the limited time which is allowed me I desire to say that I hope this House will not sustain the previous question. I hope the House will assert what is due to it and to every member of it by going into a Committee of the Whole, so that this bill may be amended. I send to the Clerk's desk, to be read as a part of my remarks, an amendment which I desire to offer. The pending measure, as it comes from the committee, is very defective, but if is to be passed at this time I desire that the amendment which I send up shall be a part of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That any holder of lawful money or Treasury notes, or coin, may make deposits thereof in any sums not less than twenty-five cents in any post-office in the United States which is a money-order office; and the money received therefrom shall be forwarded to the Treasury of the United States, or any designated depository, under such rules and regulations as shall be agreed on by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General. An account shall be kept with every depositor and shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, when the sum of said account shall reach $5. And when it shall amount to $10 it may be converted into the certificates heretofore provided for, or the said account, whatever its amount, may be withdrawn by any depositor on giving ten days' notice at the office where deposited. The provisions of this section for postal savings-banks shall be executed under regulations to be agreed on between the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Treasury. All amounts of money derived under this section shall be invested in bonds bearing the highest rates of interest subject to call, except that 10 per cent. of such amount shall be held to meet demands under this section.

Mr. PHILLIPS. That is not the postal savings bill reported by me to the House from the Committee on Banking and Currency, but it is all of it that could be made applicable as an amendment to this bill. If the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] should be adopted, which makes these certificates convertible into currency, and thus enable the people to get back their money, and then the amendment I have offered should be adopted, it would be something nearer what the postal savings-bank bill was designed to be. I hope the previous question will be voted down, so that these propositions can come before the House and be voted on. I have been earnestly desirous to pass a measure of this kind, and would accept a defective measure rather than have none. I think a loan in bonds or certificates of small denominations should always bear the highest rate of interest the Government is now willing to pay. Why should the people get a lower rate of interest than the capitalists? Our first purpose should be to offer the people inducements to save their money. I do not despair of passing a postal savings-bank bill this session, but would urge the House to so amend this bill, for fear the other bills may not be reached.

Mr. BURCHARD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I am in favor of a Government issue of 4 per cent. bonds in small sums, not below $20, at the earliest practicable moment, in order to hoard the savings of the people. I regard this bill, in its simplicity and terms, as a good step toward that end. At the present moment the savings-bank interest in this country is very great, and it demands consideration by Congress. But for that I would advocate a change of the rate of interest here proposed from 3 to 4 per cent.

Considering it to be our bounden duty in legislating in this regard to respect the savings-bank interest, it does seem to me that the bill is wisely devised. It is not mandatory. It will work slowly at first and without harm. The rhetoric that has been expended here in behalf of the poor people who are to be cheated by it is all wasted. No man is obliged to deposit his $10 with the Government any more than he is obliged to deposit it in any savings-bank. The poor man cannot put his $10 in any place where it will be safer than to invest it in one of these proposed ten-dollar certificates. The tendency of the bill will be to encourage savings and economy.

I like this bill because it is, in contrast with almost every other proposition which has been offered here upon the subject, a practicable measure. It is intelligible, it is simple. There is no trap, no device about it. Any man who has $10 can obtain a preliminary certificate of deposit for the amount, and thus he will be encouraged to obtain four more such certificates, and then he can become possessed of a 4 per cent. fifty-dollar bond. I would issue bonds for $20. If the rate of interest is found too low, it will be discovered and amended very promptly. It is neither necessary nor desirable that this measure shall be especially inviting at the start.

These certificates are not likely to fall below the legal-tender currency. We have had experience in respect to that. My friend and colleague from New York [Mr. HEWITT] understands perfectly well that when in war times currency was issued bearing 7.30 per cent. interest, after a very few days every one of those issues was carefully hoarded. There was always somebody picking up and counting the little interest on such issues; and it will be precisely so in this case under the operation of this bill. These certificates bearing 3 per cent. interest, if put in circulation, after a few days or weeks will inevitably be hoarded in somebody's pocket, unless 4 per cent. bonds fall below par.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURCHARD. If the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] should prevail, it would be to me an indication of the desire of the House to enter upon something more than a mere plan for aiding the process of refunding, which is the purpose of the pending bill. I shall therefore, if that amendment prevails, submit and ask a vote on a substitute which will include the first section of this bill, with the additional provision that the Secretary of the Treasury may, at the desire of any person presenting money for exchange in this manner, enter the transaction upon the books of the Treasury Department, and thereupon the depositor shall be entitled to 3 per cent. interest per annum upon the highest amount remaining to his credit for the whole quarter, with the right of conversion into a 4 per cent. bond at his option; and that, if the amount of deposit should reach $1,000, the Secretary may convert it into a bond so as to protect the Treasury against too large demands for immediate redemption. These are the substantial features of the bill of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS,] which, without objection from him, I propose to offer now as a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that any amendments are pending. Several amendments have been read; and members presenting them have stated that if opportunity should be allowed by the House they would offer them.

Mr. BURCHARD. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr KELLEY] is pending, as I understand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Ways and Means gave consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should offer his amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. And that a vote should be taken upon it. That was the express understanding of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that statement to be made originally by the gentleman from New York; but if that was the understanding the Chair will of course promptly conform to it.

Mr. KELLEY. I understood the gentleman to admit the amendment. Certainly it was the understanding of the committee that while they did not indorse the amendment, they would consent to a vote being taken upon it in the House.

Mr. WOOD. Probably this is the proper time for me to say that there are at least ten or fifteen members who desire to submit, in some form, amendments to this bill, and there are probably as many gentlemen, if not more, who desire to discuss the bill. Now, so far as the committee is concerned, there is no disposition to prevent discussion; but we have some eight or ten other bills of very great importance, and in view of the limited time allowed for making these reports, (to-day and this evening,) I submit whether the House should not, at the earliest practicable moment consistent with giving every gentleman an equal right on this floor, come to a vote on the passage of the bill. If the House is opposed to it, the sooner the Committee of Ways and Means knows that fact the better; if it is in favor of it, the Committee of Ways and Means will unquestionably consent to any reasonable amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from New York is willing that amendments to the proposition originally introduced shall be voted on under the rules of the House?

Mr. WOOD. As the organ of the committee, I feel bound to allow the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to have a vote on his amendment. Then I would like the House to grant us the previous question; and the hour which would be allotted to me to close debate I am willing to give to other gentlemen for the purpose of testing the sense of the House upon any amendments they may desire to submit, so that we can reach a final vote within the hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, however, asks again whether the gentleman is willing that the various amendments which have been suggested shall be voted upon without debate after the expiration of the hour which would be allotted him to close debate, if the previous question should be sustained?

Mr. HUBBELL. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] yield for a question?

Mr. BURCHARD. This of course does not come out of my time?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The Chair desires that each member of the House, if possible, may have an opportunity afforded to obtain a vote upon such amendment as he may wish to offer; and he thought, that in this respect he was in accord with the gentleman from New York, except that the gentleman from New York has no such instructions from his committee.

Mr. WOOD. I will explain my object. If the previous question be sustained by the House, I desire that in the hour which would be allotted to me for closing the debate, this bill shall be disposed of, either by passing it or defeating it, so that we may proceed to the consideration of other reports from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The effect of that would be to shut out amendments unless the gentleman will allow them to be introduced before the previous question operates, with the understanding that they shall be voted upon seriatim.

Mr. WOOD. As the organ of the committee, I cannot consent to any amendment except that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will not the gentleman from New York allow a vote to be taken on my amendment?

Mr. SPRINGER. At the close of the hour I shall ask the floor for the purpose of moving that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will, of course, be recognized to call the previous question; and if the House wants to open the bill for amendment, it will vote down the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York has occupied his hour and has lost control of the bill.

The SPEAKER. He has not lost control of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. He has lost control of the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it to be in accordance with the uniform practice that a member reporting a bill should at some time have the right to test the sense of the House upon the bill by calling the previous question. But the House has the matter within its own control. If it desires to amend the bill, or desires further debate, it will of course vote down the previous question; and thus the bill is thrown open for amendments and debate.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, my time has not expired.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall be adopted then I shall ask for a vote on the substitute I offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue in exchange for lawful money of the United States that may be presented for such exchange certificates of deposit of the denomination of $10, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, and convertible at any time with accrued interest into the 4 per cent. bonds described in the refunding act; and the money so received shall be applied only to the payment of 5-20 bonds in the mode prescribed by said act. And he is authorized to prescribe suitable rules and regulations in conformity with this act.

SEC. 2. That in lieu of the certificates of deposit authorized to be issued herein the Secretary of the Treasury shall, when required, cause the amount presented for exchange under the provisions of this act to be credited on the books of the Treasury in a savings deposit account, and shall allow interest thereon and credit the same quarterly at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum at the close of the calendar quarter for the highest amount remaining to the credit of each depositor for the whole of such quarter. And the sum so deposited shall, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, be withdrawn and repaid to such depositor, or converted into the 4 per cent. bonds heretofore mentioned: Provided, That whenever the sum of $1,000 shall be accumulated to the credit of any depositor, the Secretary may cause the sum to be converted into such 4 per cent. bonds in payment of the whole amount due such depositors.

Mr. BURCHARD. I yield the balance of my time, with the exception of half a minute, which I yield to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to call the previous question, to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND.] I reserve one-half minute to the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, to demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for half a minute.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to say I consider the proposition introduced by the gentleman from New York from the Committee of Ways and Means as looking in the right direction. The object is not only to secure the refunding of the national debt, but to popularize the national loan and, as designed, to create an inducement among the great body of our people to sustain the Government and maintain order, and so far the bill has my entire approbation. I have but little fault to find with the bill.

Now, if I am not to have two or three minutes I do not wish to speak further. I understand the gentleman from Illinois yields to me all his time except the final half minute in which to call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois had only one minute left for both purposes. [Laughter.] The gentleman has only half a minute.

Mr. WOOD. Then I demand the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I ask by unanimous consent to have four or five minutes.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not sympathize with any denunciations of the national banks. It is a great interest in this country and much greater than we sometimes are led to suppose until we have thought a little on the subject. The savings deposits in this country I assume now amount probably to not less than $2,000,000,000. They probably amount to considerably more than that sum, and the whole of that vast amount belongs to people of small means. Therefore we should walk softly whenever we walk over this interest. Allow me to say that, notwithstanding the fact that there have been failures among savings-banks, there is not an interest in this country not wholly resting upon the credit of the United States which has shown so small a percentage of loss as has been sustained by our people through the savings-banks.

My only objection to the bill as it now stands is to the rate per cent. of interest allowed on the preliminary certificates proposed to be issued. I do not believe the object of the bill will be attained by offering on the preliminary certificates but 3 per cent. In my part of the country there is to be found in every town a reputable institution which will now receive deposits at 5 per cent. I do not believe we shall succeed in inducing the class of people it is sought to interest in this matter unless we pay 4 per cent. on the preliminary certificates, and I see no objection to paying that amount.

I am not one of those who believe the poor man is better than the rich man, but I do believe the poor man is just as good as the rich man, and I would pay upon $10 as high a rate of interest as I would upon fifty, or upon any other sum. I see no reason why we should not do it. I see no reason why the interest of the Government is not sustained in paying on every dollar intrusted to it as high a rate of interest as we pay on the larger amounts. And I do not say this as my friend said who sits by me here in the spirit of demagogism. I do not understand what he said on that subject has any relation to the point I make. I say it because I desire if this bill passes that the project should succeed. I wish there were five millions of the people of the United States who held the securities of the Government. The larger the number the better, and it is especially the poor, the men in moderate circumstances, whom it is desirable to interest in the Government securities, so that there may not be a feeling abroad to which demagogues can appeal, crying out from time to time that we have one law for the rich and another law for the poor.

I want to have a state of things in which we shall all feel that we pay as high a rate of interest on small amounts as we do on large. That is my only objection to the bill, and I hope that somewhere before this bill becomes a law we shall modify the rate of interest payable on the preliminary certificates. In other respects I am for the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WOOD. I now demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the previous question on the bill and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. BURCHARD. My amendment is also pending. I offered it when I had the floor in my own right.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the previous question is voted down, I give notice that I will then move that the bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where every member will have an opportunity to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from New York admit the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BURCHARD. I had the right to the floor, and offered my amendment. The gentleman from New York had his hour, and when his hour expired another gentleman having the floor had the right to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. If that is the case the Chair has no objection, of course.

Mr. WOOD. I desire that the House shall express its opinion as to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman from New York admit my amendment?

The SPEAKER. Two amendments are all that are allowable under the rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. By voting down the previous question the gentleman from Kansas will get an opportunity to offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The effect of seconding the previous question will be to bring the House first to an immediate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as an amendment to original text and then to a vote upon the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the substitute.

The substitute offered by Mr. BURCHARD was again read.

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were—ayes 103, noes 66.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 28 members voting therefor; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. SPRINGER. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 133, nays 99, not voting 56; as follows:

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. My colleague, Mr. BELL, is detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. BEEBE. I am paired on all questions with my colleague from New York, [Mr. BACON.] If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I am paired with Mr. FINLEY, of Ohio. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

Mr. SAMPSON. My colleague from Iowa, Mr. OLIVER, is paired with Mr. CLARKE, of Kentucky.

Mr. CRAVENS. My colleague from Arkansas, Mr. GAUSE, is detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Mr. REILLY, of Pennsylvania, has been called to his home on important business.

Mr. McMAHON. My colleague from Ohio, Mr. FINLEY, is detained at home by serious illness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The main question having been ordered, the vote will first be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

The question being taken, there were—ayes 37, noes 102.

Mr. KELLEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 28, noes 123; the affirmative not being one-third of the entire vote.

Mr. EWING. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KELLEY and Mr. WOOD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 140.

So, the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 149, not voting 57; as follows:

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. MANNING. I am paired with Mr. CALKINS, who is absent on account of sickness. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."

Mr. GUNTER. I wish to announce that my colleague, Mr. GAUSE, is absent on account of sickness.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

REFUNDING OF THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The question recurred upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. BURCHARD.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw that amendment in view of the fact that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has been voted down.

Mr. BURCHARD. I gave notice that I should offer it as a substitute if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was adopted. Of course, I cannot withdraw it without unanimous consent. I trust I shall be allowed to withdraw it.

Mr. PHILLIPS and others objected.

Mr. BURCHARD. Personally I should prefer to have a vote upon it.

Mr. EWING. I call for the yeas and nays upon the substitute.

The question was put upon ordering the yeas and nays, and 37 members voted therefor, not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. EWING. I call for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. EWING and Mr. WOOD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 159, not voting 62; as follows:

So the substitute was not adopted.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. MANNING. I am paired with Mr. CALKINS, of Indiana, who is absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "no," as I am informed; and as I would vote "no" likewise, I will record my vote in the negative.

Mr. McCOOK. On this question I am paired with Mr. ACKLEN, of Louisiana.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I am paired with Mr. FINLEY, of Ohio.

Mr. HUNTER. My colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, is detained at his room on account of indisposition.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. SPRINGER. For the purpose of testing the sense of the House on this bill, I move to lay it upon the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WOOD. The House has ordered that there shall be a recess taken at half past four o'clock this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The main question is ordered on this bill, and it will come up immediately after the recess.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOOD. By an order of the House made unanimously to-day there must be a recess taken at half past four o'clock. If the yeas and nays are called on the motion to lay the bill on the table, that hour will be reached before the call is concluded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will determine that question should it arise as stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] when the hour of half past four is reached.

Mr. BUNDY. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The House has already ordered that a recess shall be taken from half past four until half past seven.

Mr. BUNDY. But a motion to adjourn is in order, is it not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain such a motion.

Mr. BUNDY. Then I insist upon my motion.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 79, noes 85.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. SPRINGER called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 34 in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. AIKEN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. AIKEN. Should the motion to adjourn be carried, where will this bill be?

Mr. WOOD. I desire also to submit a question to the Chair, whether under the order of the House setting aside to-day for the consideration of reports from the Committee of Ways and Means——

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to answer first the inquiry of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN.] Should the House now adjourn this bill will come up the first thing to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal, the main question having been ordered upon it.

Mr. AIKEN. There would then be no night session to-night?

The SPEAKER. There would not be.

Many MEMBERS. We do not want any.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll upon the motion that the House adjourn; but before the call was concluded,

Mr. CONGER said: I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. It is now half past four o'clock, and the House has ordered that a recess shall be taken from this time until half past seven this evening.

The SPEAKER. That is an unusual question of order, and has arisen but once before, so far as the memory of the Chair carries him, and that was in 1867, as will be seen from the following:

> Where a motion is made to adjourn before the hour for taking a recess has arrived, and the yeas and nays are ordered to be taken upon the motion, the roll-call must be completed, and the result of the vote must be announced by the Chair, even though the roll-call is not completed until after the hour for taking the recess has expired; and if the question is decided in the affirmative, the House stands adjourned until the morrow.—Congressional Globe, first session. Thirty-ninth Congress.

The House to-day made order that there should be a recess taken from half past four until half past seven this evening. There was no motion made to reconsider and table that order, and the Chair entertains this motion to adjourn as the only motion which would enable the House to change its order and allow it to proceed. If the motion was one relating only to the pending bill in one of its stages, the Chair would declare the House in recess from this time. But the Chair thinks that the House should have an opportunity to change its mind in regard to a recess, more especially when such change would not affect the condition of the pending bill.

The Chair will state incidentally that from the call of the roll, so far as it has been carried, the motion to adjourn would seem to be voted down. As soon as the roll-call is completed, should the motion to adjourn not prevail, the Chair will immediately declare the House in recess, that being the first moment when the order for a recess can take effect.

The Clerk completed the call of the roll, which resulted—yeas 77, nays 127, not voting 84; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

And then, in accordance with previous order, the House (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) took a recess until seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

CERTIFICATES OF DEPOSIT—REFUNDING THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is prevailing on the bill pending when the House took a recess, the bill (H. R. No. 5477) to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit in aid of the refunding of the public debt.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 20, noes 47.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] that the bill be laid on the table.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 33, noes 39.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that no quorum has voted. Nothing is in order except a call of the House or a motion to adjourn.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move a call of the House.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 34, noes 35.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the bill on the table. That will test the question whether there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The question was taken on the motion to lay on the table, and no quorum voted. The Chair will recognize the demand of the gentleman from Ohio for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The yeas and nays upon that motion were refused before the recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that they were not refused, and the record does not show that they were.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. SAYLER. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 18, nays 146, not voting 124; as follows:

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill by inserting the words "so long as such notes are equivalent to coin."

Many MEMBERS. No! No!

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not propose for one to shut off our supply of coin to meet our interest in case any calamity should happen to us. Unless that limitation can be put upon the bill, I hope it will not pass.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask that the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendment I desire to offer is to insert after the word "imports" the words "so long as said notes shall be exchangeable at par in coin."

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] demanded the previous question. If the House desires to amend the bill, it can reach that by voting down the previous question.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Ways and Means authorized its chairman, the gentleman from New York, to yield for this amendment.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no knowledge on that point.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, the chairman will explain.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with what occurred in committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I said nothing about what occurred in committee. I asked the gentleman from New York to yield for the amendment I indicated.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield for the amendment?

Mr. WOOD. I have no objection to the gentleman from Ohio having a vote upon his amendment. When this subject was up in the committee that gentleman made the request of the committee that he should be permitted to offer the amendment, and the committee accorded to him that right. But it is for the House to determine what disposition it will make of this amendment, and I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. O'NEILL. That is a poor way to get out of it. It is a backdown.

The SPEAKER. The House can vote down the previous question if it wishes.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will not admit my amendment, I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BURCHARD. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will withdraw his motion until we see whether the House will or will not refuse to sustain the previous question. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from New York will give me leave to offer my amendment I will withdraw my motion. [Cries of "Object!" and "Regular order!"] Gentlemen cannot cough me down. I withdraw my motion, and, as I understand, with the permission of the gentleman from New York, offer my amendment. [Cries of "Too late!"] It is not too late; the roll-call had not been commenced.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. Can a motion be withdrawn after the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it?

The SPEAKER. It can be withdrawn at any time before the roll-call is commenced.

Mr. EDEN. But the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MILLS. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause Rule 40 to be read.

The Clerk read Rule 40, as follows:

After a motion is stated by the Speaker or read by the Clerk, it shall be deemed to be in the possession of the House; but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to withdraw his motion, and the Chair now desires to know what the disposition of the gentleman from New York is, as to admitting the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WOOD. If the House will listen to me for one moment I will endeavor to explain the position of this matter as it stands. I do yield, as the organ of the committee, to the gentleman from Ohio to offer his amendment, and test the sense of the House upon it, and now upon the bill and amendment I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being upon Mr. GARFIELD's amendment.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 5230) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The SPEAKER appointed as the members of the House upon the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5312) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, Mr. SINGLETON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. CLYMER.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the following cases, in which no adverse reports had been made:

To Mr. SHELLEY, in the case of Lucinda McGuire; and

To Mr. PHELPS, in the case of George Cowles.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted for three days to Mr. REILLY.

PAYMENT OF DUTIES IN UNITED STATES NOTES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5548) to make United States notes receivable for duties on imports.

The question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. GARFIELD, to insert in the fourth line, after the word "imports," the following: "so long as said notes shall be exchangeable at par in coin."

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may only do that by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. My question is, if he has any doubt that we have reached resumption?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt of the success of resumption, unless by hostile legislation resumption shall be destroyed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 76, nays 122, not voting 90; as follows:

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman will withdraw that motion for a few moments, I desire to report to-night one more bill from the Committee of Ways and Means and have the previous question ordered upon it so that it may come up in the morning. The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to put an inquiry to the Chair. If the House should adjourn now, will not this bill be the first business in order in the morning?

The motion was agreed to.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

REFUNDING NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5808) to facilitate the refunding the national debt; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in the process of refunding the national debt under existing laws, to exchange directly at par the bonds of the United States bearing interest at 4 per cent. per annum, authorized by law, for the bonds of the United States commonly known as five-twenties outstanding and uncalled. And whenever all such 5-20 bonds shall have been redeemed the provisions of this section and all existing provisions of law authorizing the refunding of the national debt shall apply to any bonds of the United States bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum, or a higher rate, which may be redeemable. In any exchange made under the provisions of this section interest may be allowed on the bonds redeemed for a period of three months.

Mr. WOOD. I wish to know, Mr. Speaker, whether the demand for the previous question will carry this bill over to be acted on in the morning?

The SPEAKER. The demand will not.

Mr. WOOD. Then let the demand for the previous question be seconded.

Mr. EWING. I wish to make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would not this come up to-morrow as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the previous question is seconded, as to-morrow is specially assigned for the levee bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then this would not be the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the main question is ordered. The question is now on seconding the demand.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for a division on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 135, noes 13.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. SPRINGER called for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 116, noes 33.

Mr. SPRINGER demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the main question was ordered.

And then, on motion of Mr. WOOD, (at ten o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I have given notice on several occasions heretofore that at the conclusion of the pending bill, to amend the patent laws, I should ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 4234, known as the bill in relation to arrearages of pensions; and as there is no business of the morning hour at this time before the Senate, I move now that the bill be taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4234) to provide that all pensions on account of death, or wounds received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, which have been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall commence from the date of death or discharge from the service of the United States, for the payment of arrears of pensions, and other purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to indicate to us something as to the amount of money which will be required to pay the pensions here provided for. We ought not to vote blindly on this matter.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, in 1876, when a similar measure was pending before the Senate, I addressed a communication to the Commissioner of Pensions, and asked him for information in regard to the amount which would be required to make the bill operative. I received from him a statement which was printed as Miscellaneous Document No. 113, at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, which gives in detail, as far as it could be ascertained from the records of the Pension Office, the amount that would be required to pay the arrears both of invalids and widows and dependents in each year since the adoption of section 4709 of the Revised Statutes. I do not know that it will be necessary to read specifically the annual amounts, but up to the 1st of January, 1876, the Commissioner reports that there were 16,454 invalid cases to which the limitation of the section applied, and the estimated amount of arrears at that time was $9,529,775. The number of widows and dependents was 5,145. The amount required to pay the arrears of those would be $3,887,334; making a total at that time of $13,417,109.

There have been three years since that date, and of course I can only estimate what amount would be required since this computation was made; but taking the estimate for 1875 as an average, my judgment would be that to this sum should be added not less than five million dollars for claims since allowed to which the limitation now applies. Of course these estimates are very largely in the nature of surmises, because we cannot tell until the bill is put practically in operation exactly what will be required.

Mr. CONKLING. Making in all how much, as the Senator has it there?

Mr. INGALLS. Making in all, up to the 1st of January, 1876, the sum of $13,417,109, and that amount I should judge would be increased by not less than $5,000,000 up to the 1st of January, 1879.

Mr. CONKLING. Which makes about $19,000,000?

Mr. INGALLS. I should judge somewhere from eighteen to twenty million dollars, in round numbers. Of course it is impossible to make anything like an accurate calculation upon matters of this kind.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Pension Committee whether the bill covers the cases of persons who have received pensions under special acts of Congress and not under the general law?

Mr. INGALLS. The bill does not cover cases where pensions have been granted by special act. The uniform custom and practice of the Pension Committee has been in no case to allow pensions unless they were claims that had been rejected for some informality of evidence before the Commissioner of Pensions. Therefore in all those cases where special acts have been passed since I have been a member of the committee, for the last six years, the claims had been originally rejected, and therefore are not technically allowable under the general pension law. The committee believed that this class of cases, therefore, should not be included in legislation of a general character; but in case these pensioners should be thought entitled to arrears it would require some legislation of a different character.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether the bill applies to all pensioners under the general law, those who have received their pensions as well as those who may hereafter receive them?

Mr. INGALLS. The object of the bill is simply to remove the limitation that is imposed by section 4709 of the Revised Statutes. I will read it:

> All pensions which have been, or which may hereafter be, granted in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted, or from the termination of the right of party having prior title to such pension; provided the application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within five years after the right thereto has accrued; otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the last evidence necessary to establish the same.

Mr. FERRY. Then it is simply the removal of the limitation.

Mr. INGALLS. It is the removal of what is known as the five-year limitation clause of section 4709.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish also to address an inquiry to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions. I do not profess to know much about the pension law; but I will ask if there are not cases under the pension law as it now stands in which a party becomes first entitled to a pension some time after his discharge from the service in consequence, for instance, of disease contracted in the service, but which has not reached the point of such disability as to entitle him to a pension until perhaps a year or two after his discharge? Are there not cases of that kind?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know that I quite comprehend the question of the Senator.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Here is a soldier who has been discharged on a certain day. He has contracted the seeds of disease during his service, but the disease does not develop to such an extent as to entitle him to a pension until some years after his discharge. Are there not cases of that kind?

Mr. INGALLS. I presume there are.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Then I would suggest that such cases ought to be provided for in this bill, because the bill makes the pension date from the death or discharge. It might, therefore, entitle such a person to a pension during a portion of time in which he should not be entitled to a pension.

Mr. INGALLS. Undoubtedly the intention and object of this bill where it uses the word "discharge," is that the pension shall date from the discharge when the disability is the cause of the discharge. I presume that the case the Senator from Michigan refers to would not come within the provisions of the bill, because there must be a prima facie case established in the discharge papers of the claimant in order to entitle him to a pension upon them without additional evidence. If it appears that the soldier was discharged for disability resulting from a gunshot wound, that is a specific fact of which the Pension Bureau would take notice; but in cases where the disease arises after the discharge I do not understand that the bill would carry the pension back to the date of the discharge.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. As the bill now reads, if I can really understand English and understand the case, I think it would.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. To what lines of the bill does the Senator refer?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will read the first section down to the proviso, and then it will be seen:

> That all pensions which have been granted under the general laws regulating pensions, or may hereafter be granted, in consequence of death from a cause which originated in the United States service during the continuance of the late war of the rebellion, or in consequence of wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in said service during said war of the rebellion, shall commence from the date of the death or discharge from said service of the person on whose account the claim has been or shall hereafter be granted, or from the termination of the right of the party having prior title to such pension.

It seems to me this language does cover a period of time during which the party ought not to receive a pension. If, for instance, he has contracted a disease during the war and before his discharge which has not yet sufficiently developed to entitle him to a pension, but may do so a year or two afterward, and has done so, I see no reason why, under this or any other bill, he should receive a pension for the particular period intervening between the discharge and the actual disability.

Mr. FERRY. I ask my colleague if that does not depend upon the proof? The bill covers such a case. The proof is required that the disease was contracted in the military service. It seems to me that it depends entirely upon the proof, and the case would rest there.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. But the pension "shall commence from the date of the death or discharge."

Mr. FERRY. Yes, but that depends upon the proof. To be sure, the pension would commence from the discharge of the soldier, but it depends entirely upon the proof of the disease, whether it was contracted in the service or not.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. In regard to time he is to be entitled to a pension from the date of his discharge when he may not have become entitled to it for a year or two after.

Mr. FERRY. My colleague asks if, under the bill, the pension would not date from the discharge when the soldier has not proved his disease or disability at the time of the discharge.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. No; not exactly that.

Mr. FERRY. Then I do not understand my colleague.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There seems to be a letter, which the chairman of the Committee on Pensions has kindly handed me, from the Commissioner of Pensions, which contains considerable information on this subject, together with an estimate of the expense involved. I would suggest that it had better be read for the information of the Senate. It is not very long.

Mr. INGALLS. There is but a very small portion of the communication to which the Senator alludes that relates to the subject now under consideration. If he will examine it minutely, he will see that all that refers to it is on page 4. The rest refers to the proposed legislation in regard to the pensioning of the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812. I would suggest that the Secretary merely read that part on page 4.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is all that it is necessary to read. The part relating to the bill now before us is all that it is necessary to read, and the chairman of the committee says it is on the last page. I think he will find something on another page relating to this bill.

The Secretary read as follows:

This section not only provides for the payment of arrears in claims adjudicated, but also includes claims hereafter to be allowed. The sum of nearly $16,000,000 will be required; for the latter class a largely increased annual appropriation will be necessary, as each year will add to the sum due to each pensioner. During the next fiscal year the sum needed over that made necessary by existing legislation will probably exceed $4,000,000.

Mr. DORSEY. I think the criticism of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] is a very just one, as I have had some practical experience in that matter. It has not been more than a month since a soldier who served under me during the war was given a pension, thirteen years after his discharge, the disability not being developed for five or six years after the discharge was made, though the cause of it occurred during his service in the Army. I know of several such pensions having been granted. As this bill now reads, it seems to me such pensioners could get their arrears from the date of discharge when as a matter of fact they would not be entitled to them at all. They may have been regularly discharged as soldiers, not discharged for any disability. The disability may have occurred three, four, six, or eight years, or, as in the case I have just alluded to, thirteen years after the discharge. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that after the word "death," in line 9 of section 1, he insert "disability" before "discharge;" so as to read "from the date of the death, disability, or discharge."

Mr. INGALLS. Let that clause be reported by the Clerk as it would stand if amended.

The SECRETARY. On line 9, after the word "death," it is suggested to insert "disability;" so as to read:

That all pensions which have been granted under the general laws regulating pensions, or may hereafter be granted, in consequence of death from a cause which originated in the United States service during the continuance of the late war of the rebellion, or in consequence of wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in said service during said war of the rebellion, shall commence from the date of the death, disability, or discharge from said service of the person on whose account the claim has been or shall hereafter be granted, or from the termination of the right of the party having prior title to such pension.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY.]

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I am not very familiar with the pension laws; but I think the construction of this House bill as now presented would, in connection with the pension laws as they exist, have the effect of only giving the pension from the date of the death or the injuries that caused the disability. If that is so, as I believe it is, without having had an opportunity to examine it carefully, I should regret this amendment, only because it sends this bill back to the House. I desire very much that this bill shall pass. It is nothing but carrying out the pledge that was given to the men who went into the Army that if they died or if they were disabled their widows and children should have a pension, which of course would date from the time the man died, or, if he did not die, from the time when he was disabled. The amount involved, I concede, is large, but this people and this Government are able and willing to pay what they are fairly obligated to pay to this class of persons.

I hope the bill will pass, and I cannot believe there is danger that it will get a construction different from what Congress means; and if we pass it now as it is it will not have to go back to the House and be in danger of delay. Every Senator knows that there is a large number of women, representatives of deceased soldiers and of disabled soldiers, that feel the want of these arrears, which I think are due them. They need the money now; and they write imploringly to us, urging us to act upon the bill. I hope it may pass as it is, not believing that there is danger that where a man did not become sick until years afterward the Department will allow a pension from the date of his discharge in good health.

Mr. FERRY. I now understand the object of my colleague. I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fifth line where it is said that the pension shall have been "granted in consequence of death from a cause which originated in the United States service." Now, if the disease does not develop for even thirteen years, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas, the cause may be dated back to the service in the United States Army, and must necessarily in order to entitle the pensioner to a pension. It seems to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas ought to be amended so as to refer to the proof of disability, and not simply the fact of disability, because if he will look to line 5 he will see that it dates back to the cause and is not necessarily dependent upon the development of the disease, and it seems to me that the amendment should cover proof of disability.

Mr. DORSEY. I do not object to that.

Mr. HOAR. That is inserting in the bill the very principle at which the bill is aimed, to wit, to have the pension paid from the time the title to the pension accrued without regard to the delay in the proof.

Mr. INGALLS. In my judgment there is no danger of any injurious or dangerous construction being placed upon this measure by the Commissioner of Pensions; and I am very confident that the case which the Senator from Michigan suggests is one that is not likely under any circumstances to arise. This is a bill supplemental to the general law regulating the subject of pensions, and will of course be construed in accordance with the general principles and policy of that statute. I therefore venture to express the hope that those friends of the bill who desire that it should become a law will reject all suggestions for amendment unless they shall be shown to be much more necessary than I believe that to be.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, if I remember the language correctly the statute just now read by the Senator from Kansas gives a pension in case the application is made within five years, to date from the death or from the discharge, using the very words which are used in this section now under consideration. Is not that so?

Mr. INGALLS. The precise language is as follows:

Shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted, or from the termination of the right of party having prior title to such pension.

Mr. HOWE. These are the very words employed here—"from the date of the death or discharge." Now, the object of this bill, if I understand it, is simply to give to the claimant who applies for a pension after five years have expired precisely the pension that he would get if he applied before the expiration of the five years.

Mr. FERRY. Yes; but the object of the amendment suggested by my colleague is that he should not have a pension earlier than the time he proved that the disability occurred.

Mr. HOWE. Precisely; but under the present law if the application be made within the five years, does the claimant get a pension earlier than the proof shows that the disability occurred?

Mr. FERRY. This covers broader ground than the present law. That is the point made by my colleague. It would date back to the time of discharge.

Mr. HOWE. Why date back to the time of discharge?

Mr. FERRY. So the bill provides.

Mr. HOWE. The present law is that if he applies within five years his pension shall date from the discharge; but suppose the proof shows that the disability was subsequent to the discharge?

Mr. FERRY. The point made by the Senator from Arkansas is that in the case which he has cited of twelve or thirteen years expiring before the development of the disease, the party should not receive a pension from the date of discharge, but only from the date of the development of the disease. Now if the limitation of five years is removed according to this bill, the claimant will be entitled to a pension from the date of discharge, provided he proves that the disease originated in the military service of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. If I understand the case referred to by the Senator from Arkansas, it is the case of a claim made within five years.

Mr. FERRY. Oh, no; he cited the case of one claiming after twelve or thirteen years.

Mr. DORSEY. I alluded to a case where the claim was not made until within the last three or four months.

Mr. FERRY. Thirteen years after the war.

Mr. DORSEY. Thirteen years after the discharge, and the pension was allowed, proof having been submitted to show that the man contracted his disease more than thirteen years ago, but that it had not finally developed until recently. I have no doubt that the suggestion made by the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator speak louder? We have scarcely heard a word that has been uttered on that side of the Chamber, and we should like very much to hear what is being said, as we are correcting errors which have occurred in the past.

The Vice-President rapped to order.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. President, to repeat substantially what I said, a soldier who was discharged in 1864, not for disability at all, but by reason of the expiration of his term of service, has recently applied, within the last four or five months, for a pension, which has been granted him on the ground that he contracted a disease, which has just developed itself, while he was in the military service. Under this bill, as it is reported by the committee, I think this soldier would be entitled to thirteen years' arrears of pension, while during those thirteen years he was just as well perhaps as any other person, and able to earn his own living.

I suggest that in lieu of the amendment I proposed, the one suggested by the Senator from Michigan farthest from me, [Mr. FERRY,] to wit, that proof of disability shall be the date from which arrears of pensions shall be paid, be adopted. I think that will correct the error.

Mr. FERRY. And I follow that by the suggestion that the whole theory of the pension law is on the basis of disability. If for thirteen years a claimant has pursued the avocations of life without the knowledge of any disability, certainly without the development of a disability, he should not be paid for the thirteen years in which he had no knowledge of such disability growing out of military service. It seems to me that if it is based on the proof of disability, he would be paid by the Government all that he is entitled to by being paid from the time of disability. If he has lived thirteen years without the knowledge of any disability occurring while he was in the military service, certainly he ought not to be paid a pension for that time simply on the development of a disease which he imagines, as may be the fact, has grown out of service under military orders.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator from Michigan how he justifies the bill at all if he supports that particular amendment? I understand that there are a vast number of pensioners who did not make their proof of disability in time.

Mr. FERRY. I answer the Senator from Massachusetts on that point by his permission. The difficulty has been occasioned simply by neglect, simply by want of knowledge. I am not disposed to deprive a just claimant for a pension of his rights simply because he has failed to make his proof in time, probably owing to lack of knowledge of the statute.

Mr. HOAR. That I understand; but I understand that the amendment which the Senator seems to be supporting proposes to make the period of proof of disability the time for the beginning of the pension in all cases, not in the case merely of disease which has developed into disability recently, but in all cases. That is the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FERRY. Not at all. I recall the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to line 9, where the language is that all pensions "shall commence from the date of the death or discharge." Now it is proposed to add to that "or proof of disability."

Mr. HOAR. But if you add "from the proof of disability," then you would put the limit for all pensions on account of disability at the time of proof, which is the very thing that the bill intends to change.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator perhaps is a little more technical than I am.

Mr. HOAR. My criticism is not of the position of the honorable Senator, but upon the form and the language which is proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FERRY. I accept the criticism of the Senator from Massachusetts. Then I would move to amend the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas by adding, after "disability," the word "proved;" so as to read "from the time of the disability proved."

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. FERRY. I will hear the suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. Add at the end of the section, where it says "Provided, the rate of pension for the intervening time," &c., this:

And that no pension for disability shall be granted for any period before such disability occurred.

Mr. FERRY. That will do. That is substantially what I proposed in the modification of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, that it ought to be upon the disability proved. I accept the proposition of the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I do not mean by making that suggestion to say that it seems to me any amendment ought to be made, because I am inclined to concur with the Senator from Kansas, who reported the bill, in thinking that the Department may be safely trusted to make a construction so consistent with the general purpose of the pension law that they will not grant persons pensions for a period of time before which they are entitled to them under the law, not merely by reason of the fact that they have not made their proof, but by reason of the fact that the cause does not exist. I only make that suggestion so that in case the Senate propose to make an amendment, they may have one that does not go further than the Senate intend.

Mr. FERRY. One moment in that connection. I have a case in mind where a pension was granted and upon subsequent examination it was found that there was fraud practiced and that the claimant was not entitled to a pension. It seems to me that if the amendment proposed as now modified and perfected by the Senator from Massachusetts should be adopted, it would prevent any such occurrence and any such fraud upon the Government. If a claimant shall prove that the disability he experiences occurred by service under the Government, then certainly he is entitled to a pension, but only from the time that he proves the disability occurred in such service. Now, if it is proposed here that no amendment shall be made when we have a month and a half of time to have a bill perfected here and go to the House and be concurred in there, if it be proposed that this bill shall be passed simply as it comes from the House, without any modification, we may as well surrender any criticisms that may be made by Senators. It seems to me there is time enough to perfect this bill and let it go back to the House and have all proper amendments concurred in. It was passed by a large majority in the House, and I have no doubt that any amendment made by the Senate will be concurred in by the House. Certainly the Senate ought not to waive its right to perfect the bill according to the light it now possesses.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, Senators appear to treat this bill as if it was in some way an innovation upon existing law, or an attempt to introduce a new principle in regard to the administration of pensions. But I want to call the attention of the Senate back again to this point that the purpose of this bill is simply to remove a limitation that was imposed in section 4709 of the Revised Statutes, which was in itself arbitrary, which was unnecessary, which was unjust, and which finds no parallel, so far as I am aware, in any other legislation of Congress. Let me call the attention of the Senate to the law as it originally stood in 1862 when the first bill on the subject of pensions was passed. I read from volume 12 of the Statutes at Large, chapter 166, section 5:

That pensions which may be granted, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, to persons who may have been or shall be employed in the military or naval service of the United States, shall commence on the day of the discharge of such persons in all cases in which the application for such provisions is filed within one year after the date of said discharge; and in cases in which the application is not filed during said year, pensions granted to persons employed as aforesaid shall commence on the day of the filing of the application.

Here was, then, in 1862 a limitation provided of one year, but if the application was made within that year, then in case the application was granted the pension should date back to the time when the discharge was made.

In 1864 the law was again amended. I read from volume 13, chapter 247, section 6:

That no pension claim now on file, unless prosecuted to a successful issue within three years from the passage of this act, and no claim hereafter filed not thus prosecuted to a successful issue within five years from the date of such filing, shall be admitted without satisfactory record evidence from the War Department to establish the same; and in every case in which a claim for pension shall have been filed for more than three years—

The Senate will observe that the period is here increased from one year to three years—after the discharge or decease of the party on whose account the claim is made, the pension, if allowed, shall commence from the date of filing the last paper in said case by the party prosecuting the same.

This period, which had originally been one year and was subsequently extended to three years, was by the statute now in force extended to five years, and the limitation in section 4709 of the Revised Statutes reads:

Provided, The application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within five years after the right thereto has accrued; otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the last evidence necessary to establish the same.

The Senate will observe, therefore, that the tendency of legislation has been toward a constant liberalization of the policy in regard to granting pensions: that the period, at first one year, was extended to three years, and now stands at five; and the object of the pending legislation is, not to establish any innovation upon the law as it now exists, not to establish new principles of administration or of granting pensions, but simply to enlarge the period within which applications may be made for the administration of the law upon the principles as they have always existed.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me, there are two limitations——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the pending measure in regard to the patent laws be laid aside to allow us to continue the debate on this pension bill.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Informally?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there general consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FERRY. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions will observe that the object of the last law was to remove two limitations; in the first place, the limitation of five years within which proof should be made; and second, the limitation of the date of the pension. That is the present statute. Now, following out the liberal construction that is proposed to be made by the modification of the law, the pending bill designs, I suppose, to remove the limitation of the proof.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly; but the Senator still misapprehends my point. The language that is employed in the first section of this bill is precisely the language now existing in section 4709 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. FERRY. I understand that.

Mr. INGALLS. And the removal of the period of limitation will in no way whatever affect the principles upon which pensions are granted.

Mr. FERRY. As I understand lines 9 and 10, the pension "shall commence from the date of the death or discharge."

Mr. INGALLS. That has been the law uniformly from the beginning of the Government.

Mr. FERRY. Exactly; but the present law limits the proof to within five years, and the previous law limits the pension, and also the law which provides the proof, to be within five years, and limits the date of pension to the date of proof.

Mr. INGALLS. No, Mr. President, the limitation of 1862 and the limitation of 1864 did not interfere with the principles upon which pensions were then administered nor affect the general subject of the granting of pensions; but under those limitations, the one-year limitation and the three-year limitation, if the application was made within those periods, then the pension dated back to the time of the death or discharge precisely as provided in this bill.

Mr. FERRY. Then I did not understand the Senator in the statement of the effect of the law. If that be the case, then the object of this bill is simply to remove the limitation of proof.

Mr. INGALLS. That is all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question then is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. DAWES. I should like to hear the amendment proposed by my colleague.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read by the Secretary. In lieu of the amendment first proposed by the Senator from Arkansas and next by the Senator from Michigan, the Senator from Massachusetts proposes what will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the first section it is proposed to add—

And that no pension for disability shall be granted for any period before such disability occurred.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to call the attention of my colleague to this view: the disability must originate before the discharge. I take it a man is not entitled to any pension who has not incurred some disability before his discharge, although it does not develop itself so as to be apparent until some years after.

Mr. FERRY. But if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, the proposition of this bill is, as illustrated by the case cited by the Senator from Arkansas, that if the development does not occur for twelve or thirteen years the party shall be entitled to a pension during that time as well as thereafter.

Mr. DAWES. And I am inquiring whether my colleague's amendment meets the case.

Mr. FERRY. I understand that it does.

Mr. DAWES. With this idea, whether if the seeds of the disease originated in the service, the disability may not be said to have occurred then, and only developed, shown afterward by working out into some effect upon the system?

Mr. HOAR. I think my colleague will see that the statute makes very plain the distinction between a disability, which is after all simply an inability on the part of a man to use his mind or body in the natural way, and the cause of the disability. The bill says, in the fifth line, speaking of the death:

Death from a cause which originated in the United States service * * * or in consequence of wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in said service.

Mr. DAWES. I only called my colleague's attention to it because I agree with the chairman of the committee that it is better not to amend the bill at all, and it seemed to me it was possible an uncertainty was introduced by the very phraseology which was suggested. I may not be correct, however.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that under the fifth section, making a distinction between the cause and the disability, this addition that the pension shall not begin until the disability begins is sufficiently clear and cannot possibly lead to any difficulty. I will state a case which came under my own knowledge in my own city about a year ago. A very distinguished soldier had a bullet wound through the jaw, the effect of which was not to disable him from the ordinary occupations of life. For a good many years after he had a bad sore in the jaw. The effect of that was an incapacity to relish food, and at times an absolute incapacity to eat to any considerable extent, and that developed into a pulmonary disorder. When he got from that pulmonary disorder in a condition that he could not work or perform the ordinary occupations of life, then his disability began, and not till then.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, the Senators from Massachusetts are wrong in assuming that this bill attempts to fix any rules of proof. It does not. It seeks to change no rules of evidence heretofore established in the allowance of pensions.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me to say that I had no such idea as that. I supposed it only removed a limitation, and that precisely the same construction would be applied to the law after the passage of this bill as before, saving this question of the limitation. There was a suggestion of an amendment, and I was discussing the construction that might possibly be put upon the phraseology of the amendment to the bill, which was suggested by my colleague.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Indiana undoubtedly did not hear what I said when I first rose. An amendment was offered which seemed to me to defeat the object of the gentleman who offered it, and I suggested to him a phrase which would accomplish that object and would not destroy the effect of the bill, saying, however, that I doubted whether any amendment at all was necessary.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not hear that. Now, Mr. President, I hope no amendment will be attached to this bill. As a member of the Committee on Pensions it has been my duty to examine it. It is simple in its character. The principle on which pensions are allowed at all is that at the time of a man's death in the service of his country those who are dependent upon him have a right to the pension; or if he has not suffered death, but has been disabled by wounds received in battle or by disease contracted in the service, his right to his country's beneficence then accrues to him at once. That is the principle, and the purpose of this bill is to carry it out. It simply says to those who have been disabled by wounds or disease, and to such as have been deprived of support by death, that they shall receive their pensions from the date of death or disability, notwithstanding they may not have made their application or their proof within the limitation of time now on the statute-book. That is all there is in this bill. It asserts no new principle, but wipes out a statute of limitation.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me a moment, it seems to me that it covers still more than that. The object of the law of 1864, cited by the chairman of the committee, seemed to be to provide enough time for the claimant to prove his case, giving him five years. Now nearly fourteen years have expired since the war closed. The proposition of this bill is to remove the limitation of five years and give every claimant the right to come forward and prove his disability and receive a pension from the time of his discharge. It seems to me that five years was sufficient time for the claimant to satisfy himself that he was entitled to a pension for disability. Now, if the disability does not develop until the present year, fourteen years after the expiration of the war, it seems to me if he gets a pension from the time that his disability occurred, allowing fourteen years to elapse before he himself was aware of the disability, the legislative power of the Government has been sufficiently generous.

The proposition of this bill is to remove the limitation of proof in the case of a claimant whose disability develops at the late date of thirteen or fourteen years after the expiration of the service, so that he shall not be debarred from the right to a pension by the present limitation of the statute.

Mr. VOORHEES. For the purposes of the Senator's argument he assumes that the disability spoken of in this bill is to be developed now or at some recent time. The question when the disability develops is a matter of evidence; it is a question of proof to be decided by the Commissioner of Pensions. If it is shown by the evidence that this disability is of recent development, it would be a circumstance tending to justify the rejection of the claim. This bill, however, goes on the theory that a man has been disabled in the service, makes satisfactory proof of that fact, and has been honorably discharged from the service of his country. Now, let me ask the Senator a question. In such a case contemplated by this bill, where no doubt is left that actual disability or death took place in the service of the Government, would he reject the application for a pension because it was not made in five years or even in twenty years?

Mr. FERRY. That would be an exceptional case.

Mr. VOORHEES. The very kind of case we are contemplating and legislating for.

Mr. FERRY. General statutes do not provide for special cases. Now, I call the attention of the Senator, who is a member of the committee, to a case I have in mind, where within five years the claimant obtained a pension, and it was shown afterward that the proof was not sufficient and the claim was canceled and the pension revoked. Now, under the present statute it is not an obligation on the part of the claimant that he should prove his disability; he is entitled to a pension if he has been discharged within the five years.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly not. The bill does not so read.

Mr. FERRY. So I read it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me read the bill and compare it with the existing law.

Mr. FERRY. I am talking about the present law. Within five years any soldier claimant is entitled upon proof of discharge, or his heirs on proof of his death, to a pension. Now, the proposition of the present bill is to remove the limitation of five years and give every claimant the right to prove his disability. I say that after the lapse of thirteen years, during which a man has not been conscious of disability growing out of service in the war, certainly he is not entitled to a pension; but if he can prove and trace his disability to a disease contracted in the service, then he should be entitled to a pension from the date of the disability. If he has lived thirteen years without the knowledge of any such disease causing a disability or without the experience of the disability, certainly the Government ought not to pay him for a time during which he considered himself perfectly well, not experiencing any disability occurring by reason of service in the Army.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think the Senator from Michigan misunderstands both the existing law and the proposed legislation. Allow me to read section 4709 of the Revised Statutes:

All pensions which have been, or which may hereafter be, granted in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted, or from the termination of the right of party having prior title to such pension.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me to put an inquiry? As I understand, the Pension Bureau has construed that to mean that he shall only draw pension from the time when he was actually disabled from the cause which occurred in the war, and then this law would be in exact harmony with it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Precisely. The Senator from New York has caught the idea.

Mr. FERRY. Allow me. If I am not mistaken, in all special cases that have been reported by the Committee on Pensions they have invariably given a pension from the date of the passage of the law.

Mr. INGALLS. Why?

Mr. FERRY. I ask why.

Mr. INGALLS. Because the cases upon which we have acted have been those that have been rejected by the Commissioners of Pensions, and therefore did not come within the provisions of the general law.

Mr. FERRY. For what reason has the rejection occurred, I ask the chairman of the committee?

Mr. INGALLS. I have given the reason.

Mr. FERRY. Not the reason for rejection; simply the fact of rejection.

Mr. INGALLS. The rejection before the Commissioner of Pensions was under the general law, simply because there was a defect of proof or a disability on the part of the applicant to bring himself technically within the provisions of the law.

Mr. FERRY. Then the case has come to Congress because the limitation of five years has excluded the party.

Mr. INGALLS. Oh, no.

Mr. VOORHEES. I decline to yield further until I get through with comparing the existing law and the proposed legislation. I have read the statute so far as it goes until the proviso comes in. The proviso is:

Provided, The application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within five years after the right thereto has accrued.

Now, sir, I desire to show that the bill under consideration reads exactly, word for word, as section 4709 does, with the exception of the proviso. It asserts nothing new, only leaves the proviso out. The present law, section 4709, provides that a man's pension shall commence from the date of death or discharge, and as the Senator from New York has well suggested, the Pension Bureau has construed it to mean that no pension shall begin prior to the alleged disability. The position, therefore, of the Senator from Michigan need deter nobody from voting for this bill, the Pension Office having, as I said before, construed the existing law to mean that the pension shall not run back further than the disability is shown to exist, and the proposed legislation is word for word the same on that point as the law under which this construction has been made.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me then to ask the question whether he is unwilling to express in a clear expression as a statute what the law power determines, rather than leave it to the construction of an administrative officer?

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Michigan certainly knows that there is a broad field left for the Commissioner of Pensions, in which he fixes the rules of evidence and the amount of proof. In fact the procuring of pensions is purely a question of fact. Day after day cases that have been rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions are brought before the Committee on Pensions of this body. Why? Because the claimant alleges that he made proof enough and the Commissioner says he has not. It is altogether a question of fact, and it is useless to take the time of the Senate in discussing the question of the sufficiency of evidence which can never be fixed by general legislation.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me, his view of the province of the Commissioner of Pensions does not relate to the facts, but to the regulations requiring proof. My object is to state in the statute the fact of disability, and from that fact I certainly am disposed, as other Senators are, to allow a pension from the date of the fact proved. But if a man has lived for thirteen or fourteen years without the consciousness of any disability growing out of service under the Government, he certainly should not come in at this late period when proof is so uncertain, and get a pension covering that time, unless it is evident disability occurred. I have a case in mind where proof has been so doubtful that the Commissioner has been unwilling to receive it. Now, if you allow thirteen years to expire and permit any claimant to come up here and prove that the seeds of disease which has developed thirteen years since the war were planted during his service in the Army, and get a pension to date back to the end of the war instead of from disability, I think it is very doubtful legislation; it is very unsafe legislation, and it is opening the Treasury to a large amount of claims that I think would not be sanctioned if the Senate understood their proportions.

It seems to me the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts simply fixes the date of the disability proved as the period for the pension to commence; and when a man comes, whether fourteen years after the war ends or twenty-five years after the war ends, and proves that he has a disability that arises from seeds planted in the service of the Government, he should then be entitled to his pension from the date of the proof, not from the date of his discharge——

Mr. HOAR. From the date of disability.

Mr. FERRY. From the date of the disability, I should have said.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Michigan has two or three times spoken of this question of conscious and unconscious disability. He must know, as every Senator knows, that all this will be a matter of proof. The applicant for a pension must prove that his disability did exist, and if one of the facts connected with his claim before the Commissioner of Pensions is that he went about as a well man, betrayed no consciousness or appearance of disability, it would be a circumstance, as I have before said, tending to justify the rejection of his claim. But it is a question of fact; and this bill makes no change whatever upon that subject.

I answer the gentleman's question; he does not answer mine. I asked him awhile ago, in case a man did make proof satisfactory to the Senator himself of his disability in the service of his country, and had not applied within the five years, had allowed himself to be debarred by the statute of limitations either from ignorance, obscurity, poverty, or any other cause, whether the Senator therefore would reject the claim.

Mr. FERRY. I am ready to answer the question. I am not disposed to waive any question proposed by the Senator from Indiana. I would answer that question flatly and directly thus: if a claimant remains thirteen years, as it is at the present time since the close of the war, without availing himself of the benefit of a statute of which he should have knowledge, and if in the absence of knowledge without the consciousness of any disability whatever—which of course is entirely personal to himself and following him day by day and hour by hour—if he fails within thirteen years to make application or present proof of the fact when he knew that upon a claim being made and proof made he would be entitled to a pension, then I say he should not be entitled to a pension until his disability had been made apparent by proof.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator and I differ. If a man had gone on his crutches with one leg off for the last thirteen years, and from pride or any other consideration had not applied for a pension, I would not deprive him of one now, if he asked for it, because of the statutory limitation.

Mr. FERRY. I do not allow the Senator to cite the case of a man without a limb, because that is proof in itself. If a man has gone with the loss of a limb for thirteen years without making application for a pension, that is his own default; there is proof sufficient entitling him to pension. But I would cite to the Senator's attention a case—I will not name the case—where a pension was allowed under the present law upon the proof of a surgeon, and it was found afterward, upon a re-examination instituted by the Commissioner here under a new agency, that that very applicant went upon crutches to the surgeon, and after he left the surgeon's office he walked without crutches; and thereupon the Commissioner, as was his duty, revoked the pension.

Mr. VOORHEES. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the Senator if he is disposed to open the Treasury to cases of that kind; and if they would occur within six or seven years after the war ended, certainly more such cases would occur as a longer time expired after the war.

Mr. VOORHEES. Of course frauds occur under our pension laws; of course claims are sometimes allowed that ought not to be, and as soon as the officers of the Government discover that fact they strike them from the pension-roll properly and rightfully. This bill, however, does not make it any more easy to commit a fraud than the present law, for it is in the very same words with the exception of the proviso as to time.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that the debate has wandered somewhat from the question before the Senate. As I understand it, the question before the Senate is simply this; I can illustrate it by stating a fact. A very well-known member of the other House, who served with the honorable Senator from Indiana and myself and several other Senators, was thrown from his horse in one of the battles of the war and received a concussion. He was insensible a few hours, but got over it apparently, and has been a member of Congress and an eminent lawyer doing a large business ever since. He had some symptoms which indicated to an experienced surgeon that he was likely to be exposed some time to paralysis, but they never till lately resulted in anything which in the least interfered with the labors of his professional and public life. Last summer he was struck with paralysis. Now, I suppose every Senator agrees that that officer ought to receive a pension for the disability occasioned by that cause which occurred during the war, and every Senator agrees that that pension ought to begin from the time of the paralytic shock of last summer, and should not go back to the date of the battle where the original cause was received; and the only question is whether this bill as it is reported enables persons in a case like that to go back to the time of the original cause, or whether it limits it to the time of the commencement of the disability. It is a mere question of the construction of the language of the bill. My amendment makes that certain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BLAINE and others. Let it be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the first section of the bill it is proposed to add—

And that no pension for disability shall be granted for any period before such disability occurred.

Mr. INGALLS. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that that is merely an attempt to re-enact what is now the recognized principle of the Pension Bureau, and that the language of the bill now before the Senate is identically the same in terms with the language that has been employed in the pension laws of 1862, of 1864, and of 1873, under which all pensions have been granted; and if under the law of 1864 the applicant made his claim within three years, then the pension dated back within that period as the Commissioner of Pensions might see fit under the proofs to establish it, and that is all that can be done in this case if this bill becomes a law; and the Senators who are attempting to introduce an amendment here are arguing as if this intended some innovation upon existing law, which it does not do, as I have repeatedly said. The language is exactly the same as it has been under the pension system ever since the war of the rebellion began.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as there seems to be a great deal of difference of opinion in regard to this point, and as I have no doubt that when the Commissioner of Pensions proceeds to put this law, if it shall become a law, into effect, he will discover that it will require additional legislation, I submit that it will be entirely safe to leave it till then, and if there be any defects in it they will be developed. Congress is in session every year, and it will be safe and wise to take the bill as it is. I have no doubt some amendment to it will be necessary. I vote for it with that belief, but I will vote for it with the belief that it is better to do justice so far as it goes, and when positive defects are developed we shall be here to correct them in the interest of pensioners and in the interest of the Government.

Mr. FERRY. I am not disposed to sit in my seat here and allow the Senator from Maine to suggest that those who are criticising this bill are opponents of the bill——

Mr. BLAINE. I did not say so.

Mr. FERRY. Or of the principle of the bill. The remark of the Senator from Maine is a proposition that Senators should rest in their seats and decline to criticise and perfect the bill which is before them for consideration, and allow the Commissioner of Pensions, who is to execute the provisions of the bill, to discharge the duties which Senators should perform.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; the Senator entirely misapprehended me. I certainly had not the remotest idea of making a reflection on anybody. What I meant was this. Here between Senators equally entitled to an opinion there is a very grave difference as to the real meaning of the bill, as to the necessity of the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts or that of the honorable Senator from Michigan. I said in view of that difference, which I do not profess to be sufficiently wise to resolve, it is safe to do the justice which the bill now pending will do; and if there shall be developed any of the evils which have been suggested by the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Massachusetts we shall be here to remedy them. That is all I said. We do substantial justice and make a great step in that direction by taking this bill as it comes from the House, instead of at this period of the session trusting it to any of the doubts and the dangers of a difference between the two branches. That is all I meant.

Mr. FERRY. I have risen as an advocate of the principle of the bill, and yet I am calling the attention of Senators to the fact, and I think it is within the experience of most Senators that there are cases where fraud is attempted to be practiced. I have known cases to be presented to me where I thought fraud had been practiced; and for that reason I, holding the responsibility of a double duty—duty to the claimants for pension and duty to the Treasury of the United States, the property of the people at large—could not allow a bill of this kind to pass without presenting my objections. Now, if in the judgment of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions the object of this bill is simply to remove a certain limitation, that is one phase; and certainly if that be the sole object there cannot be an objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, which provides that the pension shall be paid upon the disability occurring.

I reiterate that if a claimant has lived twelve or thirteen years since the war without the consciousness of a disability growing out of military service, certainly he ought not to be entitled to a pension until he himself is satisfied that he has suffered a disability growing out of such service. Why is it that we have constantly before each session of Congress bill after bill for specific cases, except it be that the parties have not applied within the five-year limitation, or except it be that the case proposed does not come within the provisions of law? Now the object is to remove every limitation, and my purpose is to place it upon the simple fact that a claimant has suffered a disability, and it is on that principle and fact that our pension law is based.

If it is proposed, after the lapse of fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five years, when all witnesses have died or disappeared, that a man shall come here, where it is so easy to obtain a certain kind of proof, and submit to the Commissioner of Pensions his claim for a pension and be entitled to it whether disability occurred or not, and demand from the Treasury of the United States money to be paid him in that regard, I say it is loose legislation, and I say it is opening the Treasury of the United States to an amount of draught which the people will not indorse. At least I am disposed to support the amendment as modified by the Senator from Massachusetts, which I think will cover the case.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, upon a hasty reading of this bill, when the point was first suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, it seemed to me that the language of the bill was so clear as to admit of but one interpretation, and that was that no matter when the disability occurred the pension would date back to the discharge of the soldier. That was what seemed to me upon the first reading of the bill; but since I have looked at the statute now in force and learned the interpretation that has been given to that statute by the Department, and it has been constantly acted upon, I do not suppose there is any danger of that interpretation being given to this bill if it should become a law which it seemed to me at first sight was the natural reading of the bill. But, Mr. President, I find on looking at section 4709 of the Revised Statutes that this bill is substantially that section, omitting the five-year limitation. In respect to the language under consideration, it is identical in the statute and in the bill. It reads in the statute—

> Shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted.

Now, there are five years allowed in which to make the claim. The disability may have occurred in the fourth year; the claim is then made. Now, according to the very letter of that law, it would seem that that man was to get his pension from his discharge, four years before the disability occurred, just as it is supposed would be the case under this bill. But the interpretation placed upon it by the Department and steadily acted upon, as I am told by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, is that in such a case he cannot go back to the date of his discharge, but only back to the date of the disability, and that instead of getting a pension for five years he would get one for one year; that is, it would commence only one year back instead of five years back. If that is the settled interpretation of the law as it now stands, the same interpretation must be given to this bill if it shall be passed.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to lines 9 and 10, where we propose to enact that it shall be from the death or discharge of the claimant?

Mr. THURMAN. That is the very language of the law now in force.

Mr. FERRY. Exactly. Now, if the Commissioner of Pensions in the execution of this law does not conform to it, and we are repassing a similar statute, is it not the desire of Congress that his administration should conform to the statute?

Mr. THURMAN. No; there is no more familiar principle of law than this, that when a statute uses language that is in a former law and which has received a settled construction, the presumption is that its use in the subsequent statute is according to the meaning that was given to the previous statute. That is a well-settled principle of the interpretation of statutes. And it is upon that ground that I can vote for the bill without the amendment. It would have been much better if the House had made it clear by inserting the word "disability," as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, or still more clear by such an amendment as was suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts; but I really do not see how it can be necessary to amend the bill in that respect in view of the fact that the bill is precisely what the present law is in the particular under consideration, and that these words "death" and "discharge" have received an interpretation, as I am told, and no doubt correctly, by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, at the Department, which has never been departed from.

For these reasons, although it would have been better that the bill should have been clearer in its language than it is, I can vote for it as it is; and it may be that there is something wise in the bill being as it is; for, if it were changed as has been suggested, it would seem to be a determination by Congress that the old law had been incorrectly interpreted.

Mr. FERRY. One word more. As I understand now from the Senator from Ohio the administration of the present statute has been, and the probable administration of this bill if it becomes a law will be, contrary to its provisions. That is to say, if a claimant files his claim at the present time, thirteen years after the expiration of the war, he will not be entitled to a pension except from the date of the proof of his disability. Now, I understand the proposition of the Senator from Ohio who has last spoken is that he is willing to waive his duty to so frame laws that there can be no doubt upon the question of their construction, and leave it for the administration of the Commissioner of Pensions. He says that it is a rule well known that where there is an administration under a statute that administration will continue under different administrative officers. My experience has taught me that different officers have different judgments, and my duty here as a legislator is to make the law so explicit that there can be no question upon its administration.

Mr. THURMAN. As I am a little sensitive upon my law, I beg to correct my friend. I did not say that one administration would do just precisely like another in the interpretation of the law. I said this, that when words in a statute have received a fixed interpretation about which there is no doubt, when the same words are used in a subsequent statute on the same subject the presumption is that they are used in the sense in which they were used in the previous statute.

Mr. FERRY. That may be the presumption, but I am talking about fact. I find in lines 9 and 10 that every claimant on proof of his disability is to have a pension from the date of his discharge. If this bill becomes a law, and the limitation of five years be removed, every claimant on proof of his disability is really entitled by this statute to his pension from the date of his discharge, because those lines read "from the date of the death or discharge." If the present Commissioner construes this to mean from the time of the proof made, his successor may not. If it is the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, and others who view the question as he does, that for fear this bill may not become a law when we have a month and a half, six weeks, before us, for it to go back to the House to have our amendments concurred in, we should take it just as it is sent to us, then we might as well waive our right here as Senators to criticise and frame legislation.

The proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is to express in a proviso that no claimant at this late period shall be allowed to date his pension prior to the occurrence of his disability when the restriction of five years shall be removed entirely. This bill allows any claimant to present his proof at any time, whether it be thirteen, fifteen, or twenty years after the war. If on this bill such a proposition as that of the amendment is voted down, it will be the judgment of the Senate and virtually of Congress that the construction made by the Commissioner of Pensions shall be the rule of this Government, that any man who, twenty-five years from this time if he pleases, shall prove that he suffers from disability growing out of military service under the Government shall be entitled to a pension from the date of his discharge, not disability, or, in the construction or administration of the then Commissioner, from the date of the proof of his disability.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I expect to vote for this bill or something of the kind, but I trust the Senate is not to be deterred from perfecting a bill that is to take fifteen or twenty millions out of the Treasury by any fear lest any proper amendment shall not be adopted by the other House. There is ample time for its consideration there, and it is entirely unfounded to suppose that any proper amendment which may be made to this bill will not be received with favor by the other House.

As I understand, nearly all the pensions that have been granted are to be reopened and a new account taken by the Commissioner of Pensions. It is not only to reopen the cases that have been barred by the one and three and five years limitation, but it is to reopen those which have been granted from the time the record of proof was made in the office instead of from the time of the disability; and I think that the chairman of the Committee on Pensions is mistaken in supposing that the pensions which have been separately granted by Congress in special bills will not be reopened. I am very sure that in regard to all those acts which have been passed granting pensions, from the time of the passage of this bill there will be a presentation of the claim of each and every one of them for arrears of pension commencing from the time when the disability occurred.

Mr. INGALLS. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. MORRILL. I am going to talk only a few moments, and I prefer to go on with what I have to say.

Under these circumstances, with a bill before us that is to take out of the Treasury so much as the chairman of the Committee on Pensions has asserted, eighteen or twenty millions, I think it is entirely prudent on the part of the Senate to make any just and proper amendment. For instance, it occurs to me that the Commissioner of Pensions is at the present time two years behindhand in taking up the cases that have already been lodged in his office. Now, how is he to go on with this vast addition to the labors of that office unless we give him a greater force? If we are to pass this bill, I am in favor of giving the Commissioner of Pensions an additional number of clerks to enable him to execute the provisions of this act.

Another thing I desire to call the attention of the Senate to—the amount of burden that is to be imposed upon the Treasury. I suppose not all Senators are aware that our expenses have been much greater for the past six months than for the corresponding six months in the previous year. I will just read to the Senate what the condition of facts is in relation to the position of the Treasury as to imposing further burdens upon it at this time.

The expenses for the six months ending respectively December 31, 1877, and December 31, 1878, were for 1877 $136,053,399.83 and for 1878 $141,167,879.08. Our ordinary expenditures for the last six months exceed those of the corresponding six months of the previous year by nearly $13,000,000, including the award under the Halifax commission; so that instead of having a surplus as we had last year of over $14,000,000, the present year's surplus will be only $7,138,720.

If this bill is to pass, in my judgment, instead of imposing it upon the Treasury with a clear apprehension that there is to be a deficit, we ought to provide that the Treasury may issue bonds in sufficient amount to cover this additional burden. I shall not propose such an amendment as that, but I clearly think that it is the duty of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to consider that matter. I shall propose, if the bill is to become a law, that we give the Commissioner of Pensions an additional increase of clerks to enable him to execute the provisions of the act.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont if it is right and proper that this bill should pass and that this beneficent provision should be adopted, although it may in some degree increase the burdens of the country, would he not say that it ought to be done? It is only a little time since that, although the country questioned the justice and the right of the thing, we made the Halifax award, to which my friend has alluded. He was in favor of that award, as I remember, and in favor of the prompt payment of the millions required to meet it, although there was a question with very many people in this country as to the propriety and justice of such award. Now here is a matter that is manifestly just, manifestly proper, manifestly demanded of the justice of this country, and although it may increase the burdens lightly, although it may require a few additional clerks to do this work, yet, because it is right and proper and a thing that ought to be done, it ought to be done without reference to any such considerations as are urged by my distinguished friend from Vermont. I am for this bill because the principle involved is correct and just and proper. I am opposed to any and all amendments because they imperil its passage. Supplemental legislation can readily be secured if necessary to make plain and certain that that may appear ambiguous and indefinite. I hope that the amendment will not prevail.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] as modified on the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 18.

Mr. INGALLS. Probably we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is to add at the end of the first section:

And that no pension for disability shall be granted for any period before such disability occurred.

Mr. DAWES. Is this an amendment to an amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not.

Mr. DAWES. It has been adopted by the mover?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The mover of the original amendment accepted it as a modification.

Mr. DAWES. I supposed it was an amendment to an amendment, and as I preferred this form of amendment I voted for it. I am opposed to amending the bill at all. If this is not an amendment to the original amendment suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, I shall vote against the amendment on the ground that I would rather the bill should not be sent back to the House.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to inquire if an amendment was not adopted inserting the word "disability" after the word "death" in the ninth line?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No such amendment was adopted. That was the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I thought it was adopted and subsequently the other amendment proposed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment was withdrawn and the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts accepted in lieu thereof.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the pending amendment, I repeat, proposes merely to re-enact existing provisions of law and long-standing constructions of the statute; and, inasmuch as it is superfluous and unnecessary, and will do no good, and may defeat or hinder or delay the passage of the bill, I hope that the friends of the measure will vote against the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions whether or not the point raised here has been affirmatively decided by the Commissioner of Pensions in the construction of the existing law?

Mr. INGALLS. I so understand it, and have repeatedly stated it so.

Mr. FERRY. I do not want the remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to go forth to the country that those who vote for this amendment are attempting to interrupt or impede the passage of this bill. I am in favor of the bill in principle. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions smiles, and he ought to smile, when he rises here and says that this amendment is simply a re-enactment of the construction of the present Commissioner of Pensions or any commissioner. If that be the case, there cannot be any objection to the adoption of the amendment; for it specifically declares the intention of the Senate upon this point, that when after the lapse of thirteen years or more application is made, the pension shall date, not from the discharge, but from the revelation of the disability or the experience of the disability.

As I said, I am in favor, and most of us are in favor, of this bill, but I am opposed to opening the Treasury to fraud, and I have heard of cases of fraud where parties at this late period are attempting to obtain proof that they were entitled to a pension for disability, and are yet unable to prove it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understand the judgment of those who have this bill in charge to be unanimous that there is no change in the rule of proof.

Mr. FERRY. If I, as chairman of the committee of which the honorable Senator who has just spoken is a distinguished member, should propose to dictate a policy in behalf of that committee, I think I should be depriving him of his right on the floor of the Senate to express his dissent or comment on such construction; and therefore I am not here to yield to the judgment of any Senator or any committee upon a question of such policy that involves $20,000,000 out of the Treasury and out of the pockets of the people of this country. I think no Senator here occupying a seat—and there are many present to-day—will waive his right to express his judgment upon a construction and shield himself, as it is proposed to do now, upon the construction of the head of a bureau, because heretofore the construction has been to date a pension from the time of the proof of disability. I say that while the bill is pending before us with ample time for this amendment to be concurred in by the House, namely, six weeks yet to expire before the termination of this session, it is my duty, if it is not the duty of other Senators, to cast my vote in behalf of a construction that shall be so plain that this Commissioner, so distinguished as he is, and so faithful to his duty as he is, as well as other commissioners who shall succeed him, will have no doubt whatever as to the construction to be placed upon the statute.

Our duty is to frame statutes. I see my asssociate on another committee, who is a member of this committee, [Mr. VOORHEES,] rising, probably to defend this committee. I say in his presence that he cannot run any risk whatever in allowing this amendment, which is so explicit and will express the judgment of this Senate so squarely and fairly and directly—he can run no risk by allowing this amendment to be appended to the bill. The simple question before the Senate is whether the Senate now, in its deliberate judgment, will express itself in behalf of allowing pensions to date from the discharge of the claimant after the lapse of thirteen years or more, or confine the pension to date from the existence of disability.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the fact that everybody, as I understand, agrees that the pension should go back to the time of the existence of the disability, even if it existed thirteen years ago, without any regard to the date of the proof. The only question here is the mode of accomplishing an arrangement by which the pension shall not go back to the discharge of the soldier, that discharge being many years prior to the existence of the disability. The date of the proof has nothing whatever to do with it, as I understand.

Mr. FERRY. I may be unfortunate in understanding the force of language, and I will cover my unfortunate condition by attaching my support to the full amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, let it cover what it may. As I understand that, it covers a different principle from the bill; and that is that after the lapse of thirteen or more years, if a claimant proves his disability, his pension shall date from the occurrence of the disability. Do I understand the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. FERRY. I have his assent. Then we agree on that point. Then there are two principles involved, if the Senator from Indiana will be patient with me——

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. The bill proposed and reported by the Committee on Pensions involves an important question. As was very wisely suggested by my friend in front of me, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, it is whether the Senate will now reopen all cases that have been decided and allow pensions to date, not from their allowance on proof, but date back to the discharge of the claimant in all cases, not only those in the past, but all cases in which application shall be made to give the pension from the date of discharge. On the other hand, by supporting the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts the principle will be settled that all claimants shall have their pensions from the date of the occurrence of the disabiiity as established by proof. I think I state the force of the amendment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not intend to go into the discussion of this matter again, but there is a feature of this debate which strikes me with great force and some ludicrousness. We have a law now on the statute-book that will be seventeen years old in March. In March, 1862, we enacted section 4709 on the subject of pensions, and it has been on the statute-book ever since. We now bring in here to-day a bill that does not differ in one word or letter in its phraseology from that statute, with the exception of leaving out the statute of limitations.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes.

Mr. HEREFORD. The question I ask of the Senator is in regard to the remark he has just made and which is only a reiteration of the remark he made when he was up before, to the effect that there was nothing in the bill except the repeal of section 4717.

Mr. VOORHEES. The bill is not merely the repeal of that section.

Mr. HEREFORD. The third section of the bill now under consideration does that very thing in terms, and why do you want four more sections? The third section in terms does repeal section 4717; and what do you want with four more sections if the object of the bill is simply to repeal that section?

Mr. VOORHEES. The repealing section of the bill is in these words:

> That all acts or parts of acts, so far as they may conflict with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

A question more wide of the mark I was discussing could hardly be propounded. What I wish to state is that we have had a law for now nearly seventeen years which has been construed in a certain way by the Commissioner of Pensions during all that time. A bill is now brought forward the same as that law, with the exception of the time within which the application shall be made. The Senator from Michigan at once sees great danger growing out of this proposed new legislation, which proposes no change at all with the exception of wiping out the statute of limitation; and he appeals to Senators with great earnestness that we ought to seize the opportunity to put it beyond the power of a Commissioner to make an erroneous construction of the law. The Senator from Michigan has been in the public service a long time. I have had the honor to serve with him in both branches of Congress. He was in Congress, either in the other branch or here, when the existing law, construed for so many years by the Commissioner, was enacted.

Mr. FERRY. Pardon me. If the Senator will allow me, I was not in Congress in 1862 or 1864.

Mr. VOORHEES. Ever since that time, however, the Senator has sat here and has raised no cry of alarm. The Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Indiana will not misrepresent me.

Mr. VOORHEES. No, I will not.

Mr. FERRY. I know he does not intend to misrepresent me. Our relation is such that he would not do that. I was not in Congress in 1862 or 1864, when the pension laws were passed; and it was not my duty outside of Congress to protest or declare against a law that was in force.

Mr. VOORHEES. Not at all; but if the Senator from Michigan with his well-known acuteness found a law susceptible of dangerous construction by the Commissioner of Pensions, and has allowed it to pass under his observation without protest for the last fifteen years, I should say that his new-born zeal in the cause of public safety to-day is rather surprising.

I say that the law as it stands, and as it has been construed by succeeding Commissioners of Pensions, is the same as the law now proposed, so far as the time when a pension shall begin. The danger observed by the Senator from Michigan is that a pension will begin when it ought not to; that is to say, before a disability is proven to exist. The Commissioner of Pensions under the existing law has ruled that a pension shall commence from the time only when the disability is proven to have existed. We propose nothing new upon that subject; and yet Senators who have known of the existing law, and had it under their observation in public life for many years, pretend to discover a great danger growing out of the fact that we propose to reiterate and reassert the same principles in the same phraseology which have evoked the construction I speak of. What new danger is there under this new legislation proposed that did not assail the public interest under the old law? What new danger is there that the Senator discovers to-day upon the consideration of this bill that he would not have discovered yesterday under the law as it then stood?

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that I have always been in favor of this bill. I was in favor of it at the last session, and at prior sessions whenever a similar measure was before us; but I have not conceived it to be my duty at every session or on every day of the session to propose a modification of the pension law or any other law. I have rather followed in the lead of the distinguished Senator from Indiana and his colleagues on the Pension Committee to await the proper moment for action, just as he has waited for the Committee on Finance upon questions of finance. He has not deemed it his obligation at every time to protest against inimical legislation as he conceived existing upon that question, but at the proper time he has been vigilant and able in pressing his views whenever financial measures have been before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. EATON. If my friend from Michigan will permit me, I do not think he intends to misrepresent my honorable friend the Senator from Indiana, but I think "in season and out of season" he has been very ready on the question of finance.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am obliged to my friend from Connecticut. All I desire to impress on the minds of Senators now is that we have operated under the law and paid our pensions, and our Commissioner has made his construction for the last seventeen years on exactly the same kind of a law, so far as the point discussed by the Senator from Michigan is concerned, as we propose here to-day. That is to say, there is no change proposed by the bill under consideration from the existing law as to the time when a pension shall commence growing out of a disability, and we have operated, as I repeat myself, for seventeen years safely under a construction given by the Pension Office to the existing law. Consequently I do not share in the alarm that Senators express here for fear of a different ruling.

I express the hope again that the bill may not be amended. It is as good perhaps as we can make it, and if we find out hereafter that some Commissioner departed from the precedents set by his predecessors in office for seventeen years past, or should appear likely to break away from the present construction of the law, as the Senator from Maine well said, we will be here and we can take care of that question.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to state that we cannot speak with perfect confidence that we shall all be here at all times.

Mr. VOORHEES. I beg the Senator not to suppose that I alluded to any passing events at all.

Mr. HOAR. When I first suggested this form of amendment it was merely to suggest to a Senator who proposed an amendment which I thought did not accomplish the purpose a different expression, without having come to any conclusion in my own mind as to whether the bill ought to be amended or not; but the progress of the debate has satisfied me very clearly that the amendment ought to be made. In the first place, there is not the slightest possible doubt, so far as we can speak of any matter in future legislation, that this bill is to pass. The Senate is unanimous for it; there has not been a voice raised against its principle; and without adverting, as I have no right to do, to the particular vote or majority by which it passed the other House, I have a right to say that a bill on this subject, for which the Senate is unanimous, is sure to find a unanimous House when it goes back to that body with amendments. There is plenty of time; and therefore the question to us is a question of general principle in legislation, whether when a bill is before us we shall, as one branch of the Government, perfect it.

Here is a bill in which, as the Senator from Ohio very justly remarked, the plain and clear language of the text means one thing, and but one, and that is that hereafter pensions for disabilities which do not exist until to-day shall be paid from the time of the discharge of the soldier at the end of or during the war. That is the plain language of this bill. Nobody can stand up here to deny it, or will stand up here to deny it, or has stood up here to deny it; and the plain language of the bill is exactly what the Senate does not mean shall be the law, as everybody on both sides of the question who has spoken has declared.

The Senator from Indiana thinks that it is a good plan in legislation to pass a law, the plain, clear meaning of which means one thing, the intent of the Senate and of the House being a different thing, and to trust the Executive Departments of the Government with the power to reverse that clear meaning of the law when they think it wise or expedient or just. He proposes to pass this bill in that way because a subordinate executive officer has in the past previously so dealt with another statute phrased in the same way. Will the Senator apply that principle to Secretary Sherman? Will he apply that principle to the Comptroller of the Currency? Will he apply that principle to the Attorney-General? Will he apply that principle to any other executive officer of this Government who has to deal with any question in regard to which the political parties are at issue?

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator allow me to say one word?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will allow me to add one sentence, and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. I was only going to say simply that as to the Secretary of the Treasury I would not allow him to construe any law or give him any power of construction at all.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator who votes against this amendment votes that he is content that executive officers of the Government, in cases where they deem it just or wise, shall construe and act upon statutes in opposition to their plain, clear, and undisputed meaning. And they are so content that that practice shall go on that they will not amend a bill when the amendment does not have the slightest effect on the prospect of its ultimate and speedy passage.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, this bill, I understand, has had the examination of the Committee on Pensions of this body, and I presume they have carefully compared the present statute with the proposed legislation. The chairman of the committee has stated that the present ruling of the Commissioner of Pensions has been upon a law embodying the same terms that the act proposed contains. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, so as to relieve any doubt which might exist in regard to that question, whether he has adverted to the fact that in section 4709 of the Revised Statutes the proviso contains this language:

> Provided the application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within five years after the right thereto has accrued; otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the last evidence necessary to establish the same.

Here is language in one part of the section, the proviso, which refers to the date when the disability occurred. The Commissioner may have taken the whole section together, instead of passing merely upon the words contained in the principal part of the section, providing that all pensions granted in consequence of death, "or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted." That language is the same as that contained in the first section of the pending bill, but there is no language in the proviso which I have read which relates or has reference particularly to the time at which the right to the pension accrued. I should like to know if the chairman has adverted to that fact in his remarks, and if he has considered the effect of that language.

Mr. INGALLS. I have not. I propose to strike that language out.

Mr. McMILLAN. That language is contained in the original section of the Revised Statutes, under which the Senator says the decisions have been made. The whole of section 4709 reads in this way——

Mr. INGALLS. I am familiar with the language of the section.

Mr. McMILLAN. For the sake of making my point apparent I will read it:

> 4709. All pensions which have been, or which may hereafter be, granted in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted, or from the termination of the right of party having prior title to such pension.

The language of the bill under consideration conforms to that phraseology, but the existing section of the Revised Statutes proceeds further:

> Provided the application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within five years after the right thereto has accrued; otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the last evidence necessary to establish the same.

Mr. INGALLS. That part of the section is omitted in the pending bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is no language in the pending measure referring to the time the right to a pension has accrued. That would therefore present to the Commissioner a different question. It might be said that he did not construe section 4709 merely in the light of the words "from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted," but that he construed the whole section together; that the proviso limiting the pension to the time the disability or the right to the pension accrued affected the language in the former part of the statute and enabled him to say that no pension should be granted except from the date of the death or the date of the disability. I was not certain upon that point, and therefore present this view to the Senator from Kansas and ask him if he has considered it?

Mr. INGALLS. I think I apprehend the particular doubt of the Senator from Minnesota, and, without intending either to be curt or disrespectful in my reply, I will simply say that if the Commissioner of Pensions does not interpret and construe this statute, should it become one, as we think it ought to be construed, we can very readily pass a supplemental act that will give him proper instruction in regard to its meaning.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, that is very true, but that is shutting the stable-door after the horse has been stolen.

Mr. INGALLS. I think not, because nobody knows better than the Senator from Michigan that no payment can be made until the money is appropriated to pay it.

Mr. FERRY. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to the fact that when a bill is before us making an appropriation to pay pensions, we generally pass what is recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions to cover the statute. In fact we are derelict in our duty if we do not appropriate according to the statute. If we pass this proposed statute, providing for the payment of $20,000,000, or nearly that amount, out of the Treasury of the United States, it becomes our duty to make the appropriation. Therefore I think the reply of the chairman of the committee does not relieve us of our responsibility in so framing this proposed statute that there can be but one construction made of its terms.

Mr. INGALLS. If there could be but one construction put upon a statute, the occupation of courts and lawyers would long ago have been gone.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, it strikes me as very singular that this discussion should have arisen when there is no difference of opinion whatever between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senators from Ohio and Indiana, so far as I know, in regard to the proper construction of the proposed statute. If I understood my friend, the Senator from Ohio, he said he would not vote for the bill except with the construction which had been put upon a similar law heretofore. There is where I think, with all due deference, my friend errs, and errs very greatly. The construction of the Supreme Court of the United States upon a statute of Congress is of some value; the construction of a bureau officer is of no value whatever. Here is a man who is Commissioner of Pensions to-day. He goes out of office and somebody from Ohio, whom my friend from Indiana does not like very well, may come in to-morrow, and then comes his construction upon this statute, if it become a law.

I desire to vote for this bill; but I certainly desire that it shall be made so plain that there will be no doubt as to the way in which any bureau officer will have to construe it. With the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, in my judgment, the bill will be perfect; and therefore I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to inquire of the Senator from Kansas whether I understood him aright a moment ago when I think that he said that there were other amendments to the bill which he or the committee intended to move?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. CONKLING. So that unless the present amendment is adopted, so far as the Senator knows, the bill will not be amended before it receives final action?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] as modified by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. WALLACE, (when Mr. WHYTE's name was called.) The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] is detained from the Senate by illness in his family.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 27; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move at the end of the first section of the bill to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the proof of disability upon which any pension has already been granted shall not be conclusive of the right of any claimant to the arrears of pension under this bill, but the question of disability shall be open to re-examination by the Commissioner of Pensions, who may, in his discretion, require addditional or further proof.

Let me state briefly my object in offering the amendment. I understand that a former Commissioner of Pensions expressed the opinion that at least one-fourth of the pensions granted were fraudulent claims upon the Government; and I understand that the same opinion was also expressed at one time by the chairman of the Pension Committee. If the bill passes as reported from the committee, all those fraudulent claimants will be entitled to arrears of pensions. The amendment I have offered simply provides that the proof originally offered and furnished to the Pension Bureau of disability shall not be conclusive upon that question, but that the Commissioner of Pensions, acting in his discretion, whenever he thinks the interests of the country require it, may re-examine and require, if the case needs it, proper additional proof of disability. It is simply a measure to protect the pension fund from frauds upon it. It seems to me the provision is a wise one. I offer it in no hostility whatever to the bill, but simply to perfect the bill in the manner in which I think it ought to be perfected. Proof furnished ten years ago of disability may have satisfied the then existing Commissioner of the party's right to a pension, but that proof may not be such as a Commissioner now, removed from the influences which the war created, would deem proper to establish the right of a claimant to arrears of pension. All I want is that the proof may be such as would be satisfactory and conclusive to the mind of the present Commissioner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.]

Mr. INGALLS. The position taken by the Senator from Delaware is a singular one for a lawyer to assume, and I presume that upon reflection he will probably withdraw his amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let us hear the Senator's objection to my amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. There is one very important function that is carried on by the Commissioner of Pensions from day to day, and that is the examination of claims alleged to be fraudulent. Every year a considerable number of persons are dropped from the rolls either because they were placed there improperly in the first place or because circumstances subsequently arising have shown that they should no longer be continued. Therefore the amendment proposed gives no power to the Commissioner that is not now enjoyed and constantly exercised. Its adoption would simply be an embarrassment to the bill, without giving any additional power or authority to the Commissioner and without in any way carrying out the object which the Senator undoubtedly has in view, and which he and I possess in common. It is true, as has been stated, that from a variety of causes there are fraudulent claims made against the Government in the matter of pensions as well as in everything else; but it is not for a moment to be understood that because a pensioner is once placed upon the rolls by testimony that was improper or false or fraudulent he is to be continued there after the fraud is discovered. The process of elimination and of dropping names improperly upon the rolls is constantly carried on, and that is one of the most important branches of the pension service.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was aware that the Commissioner had power under the existing law to drop from the rolls the name of any pensioner who was not found to be entitled to a pension upon a re-examination of his case; but I hold that under the provisions of this bill every pensioner upon the rolls upon the passage of the bill would become vested with the right to the arrears of pension which the bill grants to him.

Mr. INGALLS. Do I disturb the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Not at all.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator will refer to a table that was furnished by the Commissioner of Pensions in 1876 he will see that the number of those entitled to arrears is very small compared with the aggregate number on the rolls. Take, for instance, the year 1868. The number of invalids admitted that year was 9,460. They received pensions without the application of the limitation in the law of 1864. The number to whom arrears were denied that year, to which the limitation applied, was but 270. The Senator will see that a great majority of cases have already been passed upon under the operations of this very principle that we now seek to apply to those who were rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But the bill provides that persons who were disabled and who did not get their pensions allowed until some time afterward shall be entitled to arrears of pensions from the date of their disability.

Mr. INGALLS. The great mass of pensioners have received that already.

Mr. SAULSBURY. All that my amendment proposes is to give to the Commissioner of Pensions the right to re-examine, so that he shall not be concluded by the proof already furnished, but may re-examine, if he thinks it proper to do so, before he pays any of these arrears. That is all I seek to accomplish by the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.]

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 7, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I give it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is rejected.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. MORRILL. I have an amendment that I desire to offer as an additional section, to come in before the last section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment can only be received by unanimous consent at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. I will hear the amendment read, reserving the right to object. I want to hear it in the first place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported for information.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC.—. That the Commissioner of Pensions is hereby authorized to temporarily employ such number of clerks, not exceeding fifty, as may be necessary to promptly execute the provisions of this act; and for the payment of such clerks the sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire merely to say that any one who knows the present condition of the Pension Bureau knows that this proposed law will be entirely inoperative unless some provision of this kind shall be attached to it. The bureau is now already at least two years behind time in the examination of cases. If the pending bill is to pass, as I hope and expect it will, but in a proper shape, we ought to furnish the means by which the bureau can execute the law. It should not be a law on the statute-book and inoperative for two years, as it will practically be unless some amendment of this kind is adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Vermont is for him unusually inaccurate in saying that unless the amendment passes the bill will become utterly inoperative. I suppose he meant to say, or if he did not I would suggest to him to say, that the execution of it might be delayed, or procrastinated, or deferred. It is true that the business of the Pension Bureau is now very much behind. There are more than one hundred thousand cases unacted upon. Instead of there being an increase of the force by the addition of fifty clerks, there ought to be at least two hundred additional clerks employed in the bureau of the Commissioner of Pensions and in the office of the Surgeon-General. At the proper time, I will co-operate with the Senator from Vermont in securing that addition to the force. This is not, however, the time, nor the place.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he makes that statement in reference to the present condition of things without regard to the additional force required by the pending bill?

Mr. INGALLS. I make it without reference to this bill at all. There are more than one hundred thousand cases unacted upon in the bureau of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. PADDOCK. I object.

Mr. KERNAN. I feel constrained to object. I do not think it germane to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the amendment is not in order. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think the bill is one at least of very doubtful propriety. It proposes to impose an additional burden of $18,000,000 at least to the burdens of the people of this country. I would not do any act of injustice to the men who served their country in the time of danger and alarm. I think the Government has been liberal toward its soldiers. Perhaps no country on earth has been more liberal in the way of bounty and pensions than has the American Government been to the people who served in its Army. Now after the lapse of more than thirteen years from the termination of the war we come in and offer a gratuity (because it is no claim of right which these parties have; it is a mere gratuity on the part of the Government) to the soldiers who have already been pensioned. The law provided that those who served their country in the Army, or their widows and children in the case of their death, should be entitled to certain pensions upon certain conditions. So far as I am informed, upon compliance with those conditions every person entitled to a pension has received it at the hands of the Government. This proposition is simply a revocation of the conditions which entitled the party to his pension, and, in that view of it, it is a mere gratuity on the part of Congress toward a class of very worthy people doubtless; but while we are generous we ought also to be just.

The people of this country have been taxed for a series of years beyond that which has been imposed upon any other people on the face of the earth. Under the present taxing system the industries of this country have been crippled, the business interests of our people have declined. That which men have needed for the support and comfort of themselves and their families has been taken from their pockets to pay the debts of the National Government. If we keep on adding to this continual drain upon their resources the people of this country will become still more impoverished than they are. While I would be generous to the soldier, I would be just to the tax-payer.

Why is it that every industry in our country is depressed to-day? Various causes have been assigned; but in my humble judgment there is none more potent than the continual drain upon the resources of the people, taking from the pocket of the farmer, the mechanic, and the artisan that which they need to carry on their business and to support their wives and their children. I think we have done ample for the soldiery. I wish now to see some legislation that will relieve the burdens of the people generally. For that reason, as the yeas and nays have been called for upon this question, I shall vote against the passage of the bill; and it was because of the fact that the yeas and nays were demanded that I have seen proper to express my opinion on this subject.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I differ with my friend entirely. If I thought this was a gratuity I should vote against the bill. I regard it as discharging a just obligation to a class of people who ought to be dealt with justly. How can the Senator from Delaware say that it is a gratuity? There was a statute of limitations shorter than exists in my State for ordinary debts. A class of pensioners were unable to perfect their claims within the five years prescribed. I have their letters here in my drawer; numbers of them letters from widows who could not find the officer to whom to give the certificate that their husband was dead. That class of cases exists. I am for waiving that statute in such cases, and if I shall ever vote for enforcing it, as I would against some claims, it will be in regard to a different class of claims from these.

I admit there is heavy taxation, and I will join with my friend in economy; but I will strike the first blow somewhere besides cutting these people off by a short statute of limitations. We have plenty of opportunities here to save by the million, and I hope we shall do so. I do not mean to vote for gratuities, because I think they are unjust to the tax-payers; but I will vote to pay an obligation incurred to these people who are lame and sick, and to their representatives, when they prove their claim to it. I will not do this on the theory of a gratuity, but on the principle that we are fulfilling an obligation which ever has been held by the people of this country to be of the most sacred character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 44, nays 4; as follows:

Mr. INGALLS. I present a petition of a large number of citizens of Pennsylvania, which I have just received by mail, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pension—the bill just disposed of. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Before the Senate resumes the consideration of its regular order, I wish to occupy a few minutes, not exceeding five, in order to make an explanation.

You will remember, Mr. President, that on Friday last when we had before the Senate the Indian appropriation bill a discussion took place between the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and myself, in regard to the removal of the Nez Percé Indians to the Indian Territory. The Senator from Kansas seemed to have the impression made upon his mind that they were removed without authority of law, and that afterward an appropriation was asked to defray the expenses of their removal. I understood the matter differently; that is, that an appropriation had been first made, and that actual congressional action had been taken. I think I was correct, for I found afterward where action was taken upon the subject in an appropriation bill that was passed in May last. I think the Senator from Kansas was mistaken, as probably he may have learned by this time. I care but little about the matter myself, but others do care about it as it places them in an unpleasant situation. Seeing the Senator in his seat, I will ask him if he meant to say that that removal was without authority of law, and also if he does not now remember that an appropriation had been made and that the Indians were afterward removed to the Indian Territory.

Mr. INGALLS. I really must beg the pardon of the Senator from Nebraska; I did not know he was addressing me at all. My attention was called another way.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I was calling the attention of the Senator to a little discussion on an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill that took place between us on Friday last.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that bill now before the Senate?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will read for the information of the Senator what he said.

Mr. INGALLS. Is the bill now before the Senate?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has asked to make a personal explanation.

Mr. INGALLS. Oh!

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will state that I was in favor of leaving the matter open so that the President could remove any Indians that he saw fit into the Indian Territory if the Indians in the Territory holding the title to the land and the Indians wanting to go there agreed to it. The provision of the bill as it came from the House prevented that. It did not allow the President to make such a removal of the Indians without an act of Congress. I was opposing that provision of the bill at the time, and after I had made some remarks the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Nebraska seems to intimate or endeavor to leave the impression that the Indians who have been removed to the Territory went there because they desired to do so. Nothing could be more inaccurate. Take the case of the Nez Percés. After having revolted in the Northwest they were captured and taken to Fort Leavenworth. They desired to be returned to their original reservation. Their request was refused, and they were sent to the Territory against their wishes and over their protest; and they are to-day rapidly becoming exterminated from climatic influences and from the want of proper medicine and food.

To this I replied:

Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him if it was not Congress in place of the Administration that sent them down there?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir; it was not Congress.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, sir; I understand that it was.

Mr. INGALLS. It was by an order of the Executive, without sanction of law.

This is the point to which I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas, because others have felt themselves aggrieved that it should be stated here, in open Senate, that they had done this thing without authority of law when in fact they were carrying out a law that had been passed some months before.

I wait now to give an opportunity to the Senator from Kansas to state whether he so understands the matter.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the peculiar, special object of catechising me on this point? I may or may not have been correct, or the fact may or may not have been as I stated. Does the Senator desire to raise a question of veracity with me?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not at all. I have no fault to find, no complaint to make myself; but the Indian Department seem to feel themselves arraigned in this matter by its having been said that they had, contrary to law, or without law, done this thing. I took the contrary position at that time, and I simply wanted it to go on the record according to the facts.

Mr. INGALLS. I suppose if the Administration are dissatisfied with any statements I make, they can apply to me for a correction. I do not understand that I am put on the defensive here by anybody.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I certainly want no discussion of the matter particularly with the Senator. I am only fulfilling an obligation by having read a letter that I send to the desk, which will probably satisfy the Senator that I was correct.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator entirely misunderstood me if he supposed that I was making any controversy with him.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I did not so understand; but, after he had said that this was done without law, I received some telegrams saying that that thing sounded very badly for the Administration that they should be sending Indians into the Territory without any authority of law, and that they thought I was correct in the matter, that legislative action had been taken beforehand, and they said this matter ought to be set right before the Senate. Now, in order to set it right, I communicated with the Department, receiving the letter which I send to the desk.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly, let that go on the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks that a letter be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 16, 1879.

SIR: In reply to your request for information in regard to the removal of the Nez Percés, I have to say that the Nez Percés were not removed from military control at Fort Leavenworth until the 21st of July last; and the removal was made in accordance with the provision of law contained in the Indian appropriation bill, dated May 27, 1878, which reads as follows:

"For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in the removal of the Nez Percé Indians of Joseph's band, now held as prisoners of war at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, to such suitable location in the Indian Territory as the United States has a right to use for such purpose, consistent with existing treaties or arrangements with tribes occupying Indian Territory, and for their settlement thereon, * * * the sum of $20,000: Provided, That such amount of the above sum as may be necessary for said removal and for subsistence for remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, may be immediately available."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. A. HAYT, Commissioner.

Hon. A. SAUNDERS, United States Senate.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That letter confirms what I have said on the subject, and I presume the Senator from Kansas has no objection to the position taken. He was only mistaken, I presume, in saying that the impression seemed to be on his mind that they had been removed and the appropriation asked for afterward, when, in fact, the appropriation was first made and then they were under authority of that law removed to the Territory. That is all there is of it.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 309) for the relief of Andrew F. Higgins, of Brown County, Ohio, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5219) granting a pension to Belinda Macdonald, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1182) granting a pension to Louis S. Blair, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1789) granting a pension to Miles L. Reed, of Newcastle, Indiana, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1414) granting a pension to James H. Woodard, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1635) for the relief of Samuel I. Gustin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HOWE. I was told just now, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG,] that an order was passed during the morning hour authorizing Mr. Harlow J. Phelps to withdraw some papers from the files of the Senate. Among these papers are some originals not filed by Mr. Phelps, but communicated to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury, papers which are necessary to the files of the Treasury Department, and which they are likely to have occasion to use in litigation very soon. I wish to suggest that the order should be so modified as not to authorize the withdrawal of those papers, but only the papers filed by Mr. Phelps himself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this modification of the order made this morning?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

On motion of Mr. BRUCE, it was Ordered, That Eunice J. Stockwell have leave to withdraw her papers from the files of the Senate upon leaving copies of the same.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order, being the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes, is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment be reported again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is in section 2, line 10, to strike out all after the word "cases," where it first occurs, down to and including the word "awarded," in line 23; in line 27, to strike out all after the word "case," down to and including the word "recovery," in line 29; and to strike out lines 36, 37, 38, 39, and down to and including the word "aforesaid," in line 40, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

No account of profits or savings shall in any case be allowed; but evidence thereof may be admitted as tending to prove what shall be deemed a reasonable license fee as compensation for the infringement.

Mr. WITHERS. Before the yeas and nays are taken, I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is detained from his seat by indisposition.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I ought to state that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] was called away this afternoon by sickness in his family. I do not know how he would vote on the proposition, nor do I know how he would have voted on the preceding bill. I rise to state the fact that he was called away from the Chamber.

Mr. MAXEY. My colleague [Mr. COKE] is, absent on a very sad official duty in Texas. His views are similar to those indicated by me in my vote. I shall vote "nay" on this question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 6, nays 32; as follows:

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask if there are any executive messages from the President to-day?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There are. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 21, noes 18; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. No. 5477) to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit in aid of the refunding of the public debt;

A bill (H. R. No. 5548) to make United States notes receivable for duties on imports; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5888) to facilitate the refunding the national debt.

MEMORIAL SERVICES TO PROFESSOR HENRY.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask for the consideration of the resolution I submitted yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate will now take a recess until 7.45 p. m., at which time they will meet in this Chamber and proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to participate in the ceremonies commemorative of the life and services of Professor Henry, late Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

The resolution was agreed to; and the Senate accordingly took a recess until seven o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Vice-President be directed on the return of the Senate from the Hall of the House of Representatives to adjourn it until to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this suggestion the Chair hears no objection. Senators now present will proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to participate in the ceremonies commemorative of the life and services of Professor Henry, late Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives; and on its return (at eleven o'clock and two minutes p. m.) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 16, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. W. V. TUDOR, Methodist Episcopal Church South, Saint Louis, Missouri.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. WOOD. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the bill (H. R. No. 5808) to facilitate the refunding the national debt, which comes over as unfinished business, the previous question having been ordered on the engrossment and third reading.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My colleague from New York yields to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] demands the regular order, and cannot yield.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. This is a matter of some importance to the business of the House.

Mr. BALLOU. I desire to make a privileged report. Does not that take precedence of the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Will the regular order, the bill of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] conflict with the special order for this day—the Mississippi levee bill?

The SPEAKER. It will not, except that it has first to be got rid of, and then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ROBERTSON.]

Mr. BEEBE. My colleague yields to me.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from New York withdraws the demand for the regular order, and the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU] rises to make a privileged report.

Mr. WOOD. I demand the regular order, and yield to no one.

REFUNDING NATIONAL DEBT.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. No. 5808) to facilitate the refunding the national debt, on which the main question has been ordered. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WOOD. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. Let the bill be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] to permit me to offer an amendment to the bill, providing that all bonds hereafter issued by the Government shall be liable to federal taxation.

Mr. WOOD. I decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. EDEN. Would it be in order to amend the bill so that this double interest should only run for thirty days and the interest on called bonds cease in thirty days?

Mr. WOOD. We have another bill making that provision, and will take an early opportunity of reporting it.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER. In obedience to the order of the House, made under a suspension of the rules, assigning as a special order for to-day the bill for the improvement of the Mississippi River, for consideration in Committee of the Whole, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ROBERTSON.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the special order, the bill for the improvement of the Mississippi River.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4318) to provide for the organization of "the Mississippi River improvement commission," and for the correction, permanent location, and deepening of the channel, and the improvement of the navigation of said Mississippi River and the protection of its alluvial lands.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there is hereby created a commission, to be called "the Mississippi River improvement commission," to be composed of five persons.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint five commissioners, and shall in like manner fill any vacancy or vacancies which may occur in said commission. Said commission shall be composed of three officers of the Army Engineer Corps, one of whom shall be designated by the President of the United States as president of the commission, and two persons from civil life, who, by their residence and experience, shall be familiar with the navigation of said river, and with the effect of the overflow of said river upon the alluvial lands of the Mississippi Delta. And for the services and duties hereinafter prescribed, the said Army officers shall receive no other or additional pay or compensation than is now allowed them by law, and the other two commissioners shall receive as pay and compensation each the sum of $3,000 per annum. Said commissioners appointed as above shall remain members of said board during good behavior, subject to removal by the President of the United States for cause.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of said commission to direct and complete such surveys of said river, between the city of Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri, and the passes at the mouth of said river, as may now be in progress, and to make such additional surveys, examinations, and investigations, hydrographical and topographical, as may be deemed necessary by said commission, to enable it to perform its duties and to carry out the objects of this act with the greatest advantage to the public interests; and to enable said commission to complete such surveys, and to make such additional surveys, examinations, and investigations; and the Secretary of War shall, when requested by said commission, detail from the Engineer Corps of the Army such officers and men as may be necessary, and shall place in the charge and for the use of said commission such vessel or vessels and such machinery and instruments as may be under his control and may be deemed necessary; and the said commission may, with the approval of the Secretary of War, employ such additional force and assistants, and provide, by purchase or otherwise, such vessels or boats and such instruments and means as may be deemed necessary.

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of the said commission to take into consideration such plans and estimates for the correction and permanent location and deepening of the channel of the Mississippi River and the improvement of the navigation of said river, and for the protection of the alluvial lands of the Mississippi Delta from overflow from said river, as may be suggested by any member or members of said commission, and by other persons, and to prepare and mature plans for, and estimates of, the cost of a general system of works for the correction and permanent location and deepening of the channel and the improvement of the navigation of said Mississippi River and the protection of said lands between Saint Louis, Missouri, and the passes at the mouth of said river; and when so prepared and matured and approved by the president of said commission, to make and submit to the President of the United States of America a full and detailed report of their proceedings and actions, and of such plans and estimates, for the purposes aforesaid, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

SEC. 5. If such plans and estimates, or such plans, shall be approved by the Congress of the United States, then the construction and completion of said works according to such plans shall be conducted and carried on by the Secretary of War, under the supervision and direction of said commission; and said commission shall annually, prior to the commencement of each regular session of Congress, make and submit to the Secretary of War, to be by him submitted to the Congress of the United States, full and detailed reports of their proceedings and actions, and of all works and improvements done, and the cost thereof, and of the progress and effects of such works, and of estimates of the necessary amounts of appropriations for successfully and efficiently carrying on the construction of said works and improvements, and also for the completion of such works and improvements according to the said plans.

SEC. 6. The said commission, or a majority of said commission, including the president thereof, may, prior to the completion of all the surveys and examinations contemplated by this act, and prior to the submission to the President of the United States of their matured plans and estimates for the purposes aforesaid, prepare and submit to the President of the United States plans, specifications, and estimates for such immediate works as may be necessary for closing such outlets of said river and such gaps and crevasses in the levees on the banks of said river, and, as may be necessary, in the judgment of said commission, to secure an earlier correction and permanent location and deepening of the channel of said river, and for the protection of said lands, and as may constitute a part of the general system of works herein contemplated and provided for, to be by him transmitted to Congress; and if such plans, specifications, and estimates shall be approved by the Congress of the United States, then the Secretary of War, under the supervision and direction of said commission, shall cause the immediate construction of such works in such manner as may be deemed most speedy and economical.

SEC. 7. When said commission shall have so prepared and matured such plans for and estimates of the cost of a general system of works for the purposes aforesaid, and shall have so reported and submitted the same to the President of the United States, and the same or said plans shall have been so approved by the Congress, as herein provided for, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, under the supervision and direction of said commission, to cause said works and improvements to be constructed and completed as rapidly as the appropriations made by Congress therefor shall justify. And it shall be the duty of said commission, or a majority thereof, including the president of said commission, to prepare and submit to the Secretary of War detailed plans, specifications, and estimates for said general system of works, or such portion or portions thereof as may from time to time be deemed necessary to secure the earliest and most economical construction and completion of the same, or any portion or portions thereof; and thereupon the Secretary of War shall contract and let said work, or any portion or portions thereof, to the lowest responsible bidder or bidders, either by advertising for sealed proposals or bids for the construction, or the construction and completion of said works, or any portion or portions thereof, according to said plans and specifications, or in such other manner as he may deem best to secure the construction, or construction and completion of such works, or any portion or portions thereof, at the lowest prices and in the best manner; and shall, as a condition precedent to the acceptance or approval of any contract or letting, require of such contractor or bidder such safeguards and such bond or bonds with such conditions and sureties as he may deem necessary to secure the earliest and best construction and completion of said works, or any portion or portions thereof, according to said plans and specifications, and shall prescribe such rules and regulations for conducting such work as he may deem necessary; and in the event of the failure, refusal, or neglect of any contractor or bidder to construct or complete such work according to said plans and specifications, or to perform and comply with the terms and conditions of the bond, or with the rules and regulations prescribed, the Secretary of War may rescind said contract or bid, and declare the same forfeited, and relet such work, and shall have the same rights and powers in regard to each contract or bid and to each bidder or contractor under the first or any subsequent letting or reletting as herein given; and no payment shall be made by the Secretary of War for any work done, in whole or in part, until such work shall be accepted by said commission and approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 8. The Secretary of War may detail from the Engineer Corps of the Army of the United States any officer who may be selected and recommended by said commission, or a majority thereof, including the president of said commission, to act as secretary of said commission.

SEC. 9. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend the sum of $250,000 for the payment of the salaries herein provided for, and of the necessary expenses incurred in the completion of such surveys as may now be in progress, and of such additional surveys, examinations, and investigations as may be deemed necessary, and in maturing and perfecting and reporting the plans and estimates, and the plans, specifications, and estimates contemplated by this act, as herein provided for; and said sum is hereby appropriated for said purposes out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River were read, as follows:

In section 4, line 17, strike out the words "President of the United States of America," and insert the words "Secretary of War."

In section 5, line 5, strike out the words "under the supervision and direction of said commission."

In section 6, line 4, strike out the words "President of the United States" and insert the words "Secretary of War;" and in line 18, strike out the words "under the supervision and direction of said commission."

Mr. BRIGHT. I would like to hear the report read.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

To appreciate the national importance of keeping in repair the great river highway between Saint Louis and the Gulf of Mexico, a comprehensive review of the whole Mississippi River system seems necessary. The many navigable tributaries and subtributaries which flow from the region of the lakes in the North, the Alleghanies in the East, and the Rocky Mountains in the West, converge and unite in one grand trunk-line known as the Lower Mississippi. Many States and Territories have a business interest in this system, and, while sharing its benefits, should also share the damages and cost of repairs. Your committee therefore consider the questions of river improvement and alluvial lands as intimately and inseparably connected. To treat of one question to the exclusion of the other, and to go to an extreme on either side, would be to ignore the fact that business is conservative, made up of checks and balances, facts and figures, and not radical theories.

There are, in print, many official reports of surveys and other authorities on the Mississippi and its various tributaries, but these contain detached information, and no one is sufficiently general and comprehensive to embrace the whole river system. The magnitude and national importance of the system are too little understood by the general public. To supply that information we have made use of a map and manuscript prepared by Alexander D. Anderson, giving a concise descriptive and statistical review of this great natural and national highway of commerce.

HISTORICAL NOTES.

In the early days of European discovery and rivalries in the Mississippi Valley its comprehensive river system played a prominent part on the stage of public affairs. The discovery of the river in 1541 by the Spaniards under De Soto was, about a century later, followed by explorations by the French, under the lead of Marquette, Joliet, and La Salle, who entered the valley from the north. La Salle, during the years 1679–'83, explored the river throughout its whole length, took possession of the great valley in the name of France, and called it Louisiana in honor of his king, Louis XIV. Then resulted grand schemes for developing the resources of the valley, which a French writer described as "the regions watered by the Mississippi, immense unknown virgin solitudes, which the imagination filled with riches." One Crozat, in 1712, secured from the king a charter giving him almost imperial control of the commerce of the whole Mississippi Valley. There was at that date no European rival to dispute French domination, for the English of New England and the other Atlantic colonies had not extended their settlements westward across the Alleghanies, and the Spanish in the Southwest, or New Spain, had not pushed their conquests farther north than New Mexico. Crozat's trading privileges covered an area many times larger than all France, and as fertile as any on the face of the earth. But he was unequal to the opportunity, and, failing in his efforts, soon surrendered the charter. John Law, a Scotchman, at first a gambler, and subsequently a bold, visionary, but brilliant financier, succeeded Crozat in the privileges of this grand scheme, and secured from the successor of Louis XIV a monopoly of the trade and development of the French possessions in the valley. In order to carry into effect his wild enterprise he organized a colossal stock company, called "The Western Company," but more generally known in history as "The Mississippi Bubble." According to the historian Monette, "it was vested with the exclusive privilege of the entire commerce of Louisiana and New France, and with authority to enforce its rights. It was authorized to monopolize the trade of all the colonies in the provinces and of all the Indian tribes within the limits of that extensive region, even to the remotest source, of every stream tributary in any wise to the Mississippi." So skillful and daring were his manipulations that he bewitched the French people with the fascination of stock gambling. But the bubble soon burst, and its explosion upset the finances of the whole kingdom.

The French made little progress in the settlement and development of the great valley, and in 1762 and 1763, after a supremacy of nearly a hundred years, were crowded out by the English from the east and the Spanish from the southwest, the Mississippi River forming the dividing line between the conquests of those two nations.

The Spanish officials, for the purpose of promoting colonization, and to aid in establishing trading-posts on the Mississippi, Missouri, Arkansas, Red, and other rivers, in the western half of the valley, granted to certain individuals, pioneers, and settlers, immense tracts of land. They accomplished even less than the French in peopling the valley; but whatever progress was made under the successive supremacies of the French, Spanish, and British, the Mississippi and its navigable tributaries furnished the only highways of communication and commerce.

The United States, as a result of the revolutionary war, dispossessed the British of the eastern half of the valley (except that portion east of the Mississippi and below the thirty-first degree of north latitude to Bayou Manchac, which remained in undisputed possession of Spain until 1810, when the people of that territory now known as the Florida parishes of Louisiana threw off the Spanish yoke, captured the forts at Baton Rouge and other points of military occupation, and declared and maintained their independence until Governor Claiborne dispersed the legislature and government of the people, and the United States Government extended its authority over the territory, but which Spain did not cede to the United States until 1819,) and in 1803, by the treaty of Paris, purchased the western half from France, which she, three years before, had reacquired from Spain. Then began a thorough development of the valley, and the thrifty American civilization made good use of the river highway. It became one of the most important channels of commerce in the world; but its prestige was soon eclipsed by the advance of railways, and for years past the natural highway has been less used than the artificial ones.

At the present time, however, this river system is once more coming into great prominence, both in a national and international sense. One scheme for its improvement contemplates an outlay of $45,000,000 in the construction of levees. Another proposes its improvement on the jetty plan with an outlay of $50,000,000. Still others aim at the removal of sand-bars, snags, shoals, and overcoming the obstructions caused by rapids. Direct shipments of grain are proposed from the center of the valley to Europe. The river is also considered an important factor in the development of direct and increased trade with Cuba, Brazil, Mexico, and other Spanish-American nations. To facilitate these commendable schemes, it is proposed to improve and deepen the channel of the Lower Mississippi, which we have termed the grand trunk-line of the whole system, so that its waters may float ocean steamers, and make continuous the navigation of the great interior of the United States with the Gulf and the ocean. In brief, the new era of peace, material development, revival of industries, and extension of trade, which is succeeding several years of political strife and business depression, finds in the Mississippi River system a fine field for operations. The problem of cheap transportation, so important to the welfare of the producing classes, looks to the river and its many navigable tributaries for solution. Considering the national importance of that question at the present time, it is safe to assert that the river system has reached a point in its history where it will soon regain its lost prestige.

DESCRIPTIVE NOTES.

The Mississippi and its navigable tributaries intersect and supply with cheap transportation nearly every portion of the vast agricultural region extending from the lakes to the Gulf and from the Alleghany to the Rocky Mountains, an area of about 2,000,000 square miles: in other words, about two-thirds of the area of the whole United States. Strictly speaking, the Mississippi River basin contains but 1,257,545 square miles. That total is, according to Walker's Statistical Atlas of the United States, composed of the following minor basins or subdivisions, viz:

	Square miles.
Lower Mississippi	65,646
Upper Mississippi	179,635
Missouri	527,690
Arkansas	184,742
Ohio	207,111
Red	94,721

But the region drained and in a business way benefited by the Mississippi River system is more extensive than the mere basins, and it is fairer to use the first-mentioned area (which is that given by Foster, in his excellent work on the valley) as the proper measure of territory for the purposes of this review.

The following table shows the number of miles which the river and each one of its tributaries is navigable from its mouth to the place designated on the accompanying map as the head of navigation:

Rivers.	Miles.	Rivers.	Miles.
Missouri	3,127	Cumberland	653
Mississippi	2,166	White	460
Ohio	1,021	Washita	445
Red	820	Yellowstone	438
Tennessee	759	Wabash	369
Arkansas	668	Alleghany	325
Minnesota	295	Chippewa	90
Illinois	269	Iowa	80
Yazoo	240	Saint Francis	80
Osage	237	Saint Croix	65
Sunflower	207	Rock	64
Tallahatchie	200	Kentucky	60
Green	200	Black (Louisiana.)	54
Wisconsin	160	Big Horn	50
Black (Arkansas)	136	Clinch	50
Monongahela	110
Kanawha	94	Total	14,086
Muskingum	94

It will be observed that several of the rivers placed on the map are not navigable. Some of them can easily be made so, and when the country becomes more densely populated doubtless will be suitably improved. The Mississippi River, for instance, can, by use of locks, be made navigable to Leech Lake, about six hundred miles above the present head of navigation. In the same way the navigation of the Missouri, Yellowstone, Red, and other tributaries may be extended. It will also be observed that the mileage, as given in the above table, is to the heads of navigation. In most instances that means continuous navigation, but not always so. For instance the navigation of the Mississippi is broken at Saint Anthony's Falls, and then is resumed and extends to Sauk Rapids. In the Tennessee River there is an interruption at Muscle Shoals, in the State of Alabama, and another below Chattanooga. In the Red River there is also an interruption of continuous navigation. But these breaks in continuous navigation exist in only a few of the above list of tributaries, and can, with little expense, be overcome whenever Congress furnishes the necessary legislation.

Did time permit, it would be interesting to give descriptive notes on each of the thirty-three navigable rivers of the Mississippi system, stating the general features and characteristics of each, the nature of the interruptions to continuous navigation, the kind of boats used, or capable of being used, on each, the number of miles of navigation, which, by improvements and repairs, might be added to each river, &c. Such a review is much needed in the interest of commerce, and intelligent and adequate legislation, and it is to be regretted that no provision has been made for its preparation.

A noticeable feature of the system, as may be seen on the map, is that on the east and west it nearly connects with rivers flowing into the Atlantic and Pacific. The James River in Virginia so nearly unites with the Kanawha, which is a tributary of the Ohio, that ever since the days of Washington, who originated and first advocated the plan, it has been proposed to connect in this manner the waters of the Atlantic with those of the Mississippi Valley. At the present time there is a bill pending before Congress asking that a commission of engineers be appointed "whose duty it shall be to proceed at once to make a survey of and consider and mature plans for the construction of a navigable canal from the Upper Columbia River to the Upper Missouri River." A continuous water-line from New York City to the waters of the Mississippi, by way of Hudson River, the Erie Canal, and the great lakes, has been much discussed, and in 1874 its construction was strongly recommended by a select committee of the United States Senate.

Thus it is proposed, by supplementing the Mississippi system on the north, east, and west, to extend the water highways of commerce across the continent, not only from the lakes to the Gulf, but from ocean to ocean.

A NATIONAL HIGHWAY.

The navigable portions of this vast river system either intersect or border eighteen States and two Territories. Each one of these States and Territories has an extensive business interest in the Lower Mississippi or trunk-line, as well as the particular portions of the river highway which touch its own territory. The mileage of the navigable portions of the system which cross or border each State is nearly as follows:

States.	Miles.	States.	Miles.
Arkansas	1,826	Minnesota	660
Missouri	1,504	Wisconsin	560
Louisiana	1,314	Ohio	556
Montana	1,311	Nebraska	400
Illinois	1,277	Pennsylvania	380
Tennessee	1,220	Texas	300
Mississippi	1,207	Dakota	285
Kentucky	1,187	Alabama	250
Iowa	845	Kansas	190
Indiana	840	West Virginia	104

An estimate of the political power of these States and Territories shows how national are the interests attaching to the river. Of the three hundred and one representatives of the people in the present Congress, the eighteen States and two Territories sent one hundred and seventy-one. This representation is based on population, and, according to the last census, those States and Territories had a population of 22,215,022, against 16,343,349 in the rest of the United States.

Again, a comparison of some of the leading products of those eighteen States with the products of the whole United States illustrates very clearly the national character of this comprehensive highway. According to the recent annual report of the United States Commissioner of Agriculture, they, in 1876, produced 1,123,106,000 bushels of Indian corn of the total 1,283,827,500 bushels produced in the whole Union; in other words, over 87 per cent. of the whole national crop.

The wheat product of the same eighteen States was 206,899,000 bushels against the total 289,356,500 bushels of the whole United States, or 69 per cent. They produced 72 per cent. of the total rye product of the United States. During the same year they furnished 70 per cent., or $19,811,650 of the total $28,282,968 worth of tobacco produced in the United States. Of the total 4,438,000 bales of cotton grown in the whole United States in 1876, they produced 74 per cent., or 3,318,000 bales. As the statistics of pork packing are usually given by cities instead of States, we will take, for a further comparison, the value of live hogs in 1876. According to the same authority, the Commissioner of Agriculture, the value of the hogs of the eighteen States was estimated to be $137,154,406, and those of the whole Union $171,077,196, or 71 per cent.

The chief coal fields of the United States, those of Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and Missouri, are in close proximity to the navigable waters of the Mississippi or its tributaries. The extensive iron deposits of Tennessee, Western Pennsylvania, and Missouri also adjoin this national highway. It furnishes water communication with the ocean for the commerce and freights of such cities as Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Louisville, Nashville, Memphis, Saint Paul, Keokuk, Omaha, Little Rock, Shreveport, Jefferson, Texas, Saint Louis, New Orleans, and many others scattered over different portions of the great interior of the United States.

In fact, the river system itself is national, for it is a highway controlled by the United States and is subject to the laws of the General Government instead of the laws of the various States through which it passes. The law as declared in 1870 by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of "The Daniel Ball," (10 Wallace, 557,) is as follows:

"These rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used, or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition, as highways for commerce over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water. And they constitute navigable waters of the United States, within the meaning of the acts of Congress, in contradistinction from the navigable waters of the States, when they form, in their ordinary condition, by themselves, or by uniting with other waters, a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries, in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water."

Here, then, we find a highway which is controlled by the people instead of private corporations. No monopoly of transportation or exorbitant charges attach to the river system, but it is a public way open to free and unrestrained competition. It is, in nature, fact, and law, a national institution.

ITS INTERNATIONAL FEATURES.

A glance at the map shows how the various branches of this inland highway converge, meet, and finally terminate at the Gulf, directly opposite Brazil, the Spanish-American nations of South America, Mexico, and the West Indies. No intention of nature is more clearly indicated than that the commerce of the great valley should find a direct and continuous interchange with that of neighboring nations at the south. But statistics show that the wise plans of nature have, in this respect, been almost totally disregarded. According to a report on the resources and commerce of Brazil, submitted at our centennial exhibition, her average annual purchases in the European market were 85.29 per cent. of her total imports, while her annual average purchases from the United States were only 4.67 per cent.

Taking the statistics of the foreign commerce of Mexico for the year ending June 30, 1873, which is probably a fair illustration of the general direction of that trade, we find that Mexico imported to the extent of $18,897,611 in commodities from distant Europe, and only $7,420,419 from the United States. Taking the single item of cotton stuffs imported that same year, Mexico bought ten million five hundred and thirty-one thousand nine hundred and seventy dollars' worth from Europe, and only three hundred and sixty-nine thousand four hundred and thirty-eight dollars' worth from the United States. Yet her chief harbor, Vera Cruz, is but a very short distance across the Gulf from the mouth of the Mississippi and the best cotton-producing States of the world. The grain products of the valley have for years past been sent overland for foreign shipment, while the waters of the river which penetrates all portions of the grain-producing regions form an unbroken channel to the ocean.

The people of the valley are beginning to appreciate the fact that it is a costly luxury to ignore the plans of nature, and now, more than ever before, they are considering the international features of the river highway. The recent direct shipments of grain from the mouth of the Mississippi to foreign markets have proved so successful and so beneficial to the producers of the valley that it is proposed to improve the river so as to permit ocean steamers to ascend to the very center of this great river system. This result could be accomplished by a channel of twenty feet in depth from Saint Louis to the Gulf. One plan of improvement of the Lower Mississippi contemplates such a depth of navigation. But it is not our purpose to advocate any particular theory of improvement. Suffice it to say that the river should be impressed into the service of commerce in every way possible and to its utmost capacity, whether for local, national, or international exchanges.

An inevitable result of an adequate development and use of this river highway, and enlarged trade with Spanish-American countries adjoining the Gulf, will be the construction of the proposed interoceanic canal across Central America or Southern Mexico. That would make continuous and very direct water communication between the valley and Japan, China, and India. The Mississippi Valley is destined at no distant day to have its share of the much coveted and enriching oriental trade.

AN ECONOMICAL HIGHWAY.

This river system, considered as a whole, extends from north to south, from one climate to another. Nature has provided that different climates shall furnish different products, and it is but in accordance with those designs and sound principles of political economy that the chief commercial exchanges of the United States should be in the same direction. In America, at least, those principles of trade have been disregarded, and the exchanges have been too much on parallels of latitude. But, regardless of what has been the practice, it is a fact which cannot be gainsaid, that the most important trade for the United States to secure is that of the nations lying south of us, and within easy reach of the Mississippi Valley. Of the valley itself it may be said that the northern and southern portions are, in climate, resources, and products, the supplement of each other. Of the valley, and the Spanish-American nations, it may be said that one is, in climate, products, resources, supply, and demand, the complement of the other. The Mississippi River furnishes facilities for exchanges on that principle, and is, therefore, economically correct. True public economy requires that such laws of nature and trade be not disregarded.

Again, this highway is in accordance with the rule of political economy as well as common sense, which is that channels of commerce be located in regions which are sufficiently fertile and settled to furnish products for transportation. The most productive portions of the United States are the rich valleys extending up and down the Mississippi and its many tributaries. The highway was located where most needed, and where it can perform the greatest service in the shape of transportation.

Again, it is in accordance with the strictest principles of political economy in that it was constructed without expense. The single State of New York had, up to the close of 1866, expended $64,710,832 in the construction, improvement, and enlargement of her thirteen hundred and eight miles of canals. It will be observed that the mileage of these canals which cost such an enormous sum is not quite one-tenth the mileage of the Mississippi River system which cost nothing.

Still again, sound public economy requires that the cost of transportation be not so great as to check production. The question of cheap transportation has during the past few years been very generally discussed, and a select committee of the United States Senate in 1874 prepared an elaborate report on that subject. In its summary of conclusions and recommendations is the following:

"The above facts and conclusions, together with the remarkable physical adaptation of our country for cheap and ample water communications, point unerringly to the improvement of our great natural waterways, and their connection by canals or by short freight railway portages, under control of the Government, as the obvious and certain solution of the problem of cheap transportation."

The following, from the Cincinnati Commercial, of recent date, illustrates the force of that conclusion:

"The tow-boat Josh Williams is on her way to New Orleans with a tow of thirty-two barges, containing six hundred thousand bushels (seventy-six pounds to the bushel) of coal, exclusive of her own fuel, being the largest tow ever taken to New Orleans or anywhere else in the world.

"Her freight bill, at three cents per bushel, amounts to $18,000.

"It would take eighteen hundred cars, of three hundred and thirty-three bushels to the car, (which is an overload for a car,) to transport this amount of coal.

"At $10 per ton or $100 per car, which would be a fair price for the distance by rail, the freight bill would amount to $180,000, or $162,000 more by rail than by river.

"The tow will be taken from Pittsburgh to New Orleans in fourteen or fifteen days.

"It would require one hundred trains of eighteen cars to the train to transport this one tow of six hundred thousand bushels of coal, and even if it made the usual speed of fast freight-lines, it would take one whole summer to put it through by rail.

"This statement shows the wonderful superiority of the river over rail facilities."

The following statistics from the New Orleans market reports show the increased receipts of some of the articles of produce from the interior, largely due to improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

In other words, the producers desiring cheap transportation will always patronize the river highway when it is in repair.

A NEGLECTED HIGHWAY.

With the great natural advantages possessed by the river highway, one would naturally suppose it would be the main dependence for the bulky freights of an agricultural valley. But it is the channel of trade least in use. According to the recent report of the United States Bureau of Statistics on internal commerce, the commerce of Saint Louis, the central city of the great Mississippi Valley, was, during the year 1875, transported chiefly by rail, 78 per cent. going by rail and only 22 per cent. by river. The same report asserts that "at first the railroads of the Western States were regarded as being merely tributary to the water-lines." But the reverse is now true, for since railways have been so generally extended over the valley, from 1850 to the present time, they have gradually gained in relative importance and prestige until the river has become tributary to the railways. Until recently the mouth of this whole system of water-ways, which connects over fourteen thousand miles of inland navigation with the Gulf and the ocean, has been permitted to remain filled with bars and deposits, to the great damage of commerce. Along the trunk-line, or Lower Mississippi, the levees, or fences of the river, constructed to protect adjoining fields from overflow, and damage, have become neglected and broken down. The amount of this damage to property, and loss to the sum total of national wealth, is truly astonishing. In estimating the damage one must bear in mind that the alluvial lands along the Lower Mississippi, the Red, and Arkansas Rivers are as fertile as any upon the face of the earth, and, for the purpose of cotton, sugar, and rice growing, doubtless superior to any. The extent of territory subject to overflow was, in 1874, estimated by Mr. Morey, in his report to the House of Representatives, to be 41,193 square miles. This is an area as great as the combined areas of New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New Jersey, and of course many times more productive. As regards the value of that area, reduced to acres, we quote as follows from Mr. Morey's carefully prepared estimate:

"Assuming the 26,363,520 square acres of land to have been worth, unreclaimed, $1.25 per acre on the fronts of streams of the larger class to an average depth of one mile on each side, amounting to about 8,000 square miles—equal 5,120,000 acres—the whole would be worth, at this rate, about $6,400,000. Computing the rest as not salable, but worth ten cents per acre, say $2,124,352; add to this the salable land, and we have an aggregate value of $8,524,352 as the total value of the Mississippi Delta without levees.

"What was their value at the beginning of the war, with the ineffective levee system then extending something like 1,000 miles in Louisiana and at least 500 miles in the other States? The lands reclaimed were worth on an average $30 per acre, and the 5,120,000 acres became worth $153,600,000, and the remaining 21,243,352 acres were worth $10 per acre, or $212,443,520, and the real value of the whole area worth $366,043,520."

Here, then, was an addition to the national wealth of over $357,000,000 as a result of the reclamation of the alluvial lands. It is an amount greater than the value, as given in the last census, of all the farming lands of the great and fertile State of Kentucky. But the wealth gained by fencing in the river highway has, since the beginning of the war, been almost entirely lost. According to the able report of the Levee Committee, made to the House of Representatives by Mr. ELLIS, in 1876, "millions of acres have been sold for taxes; others, after advertisement, have failed to bring anything whatever, and it is safe to say that the depreciation in the last sixteen years has reduced the value to less than $100,000,000." Here, then, is a damage of $266,000,000 to property, caused by failure to keep a public highway in repair—a highway so public that it furnishes transportation to eighteen States, which, as we have already stated, supply on an average about 75 per cent. of the staple products of the whole country.

The damage not only consists of devastation to adjoining fields, caused by overflow, but to the levees themselves, which adjoining States and proprietors have constructed at great expense. On this subject Profes;or Forshey, a distinguished civil engineer of many years' experience and observation on the Mississippi, a very reliable authority, made before the Association for the Advancement of Science, in 1872, the following assertion, namely:

"The steamers that transport this commerce send their resistless waves against banks and levees, lashing and abrading them almost without cessation. Our lower river hardly ever rests. One set of waves succeeds another, and each finds its rest in the equivalent of its forces transferred to the banks and channel of the river. These lashings and abradings, independent of the other causes, render the task of levee construction more and more oppressive yearly, until it has become intolerable."

At the convention which met at Saint Paul, in the fall of 1877, to consider the river interests, he illustrated that assertion by a few facts and figures in regard to the damage to levees along Kempe's plantation, on the Mississippi, and about one hundred miles above the mouth of Red River. He cited that case as a fair illustration of the general damage to levees and alluvial lands caused by the commerce of the eighteen States and two Territories which make free use of this highway. He said:

"In 1840 I made a survey of the whole tract of more than 1,200 acres, half in cultivation. The front was protected by a levee only four feet high. Its back line, forty arpents from the front, nearly one and a half miles, had the original Spanish landmarks of 1802. The front had remained thirty-eight years without material change. The currents had done their worst upon them and still the depth of forty arpents was there. In 1872-'73 I located and built a levee on the front of the same tract, and this was the fourth parallel levee that had been built there since my survey. Its length was four miles, 18 feet its average height, (maximum, 22½ feet,) and with a base of 130 feet. Its contents were 640,000 cubic yards, and it cost the State of Louisiana $384,000. In locating the line of the levee I destroyed the back, and marks at forty arpents, 1½ miles from the river front. This whole front had caved none in the thirty-eight years, from the original survey until 1840; and in the thirty-two years of commercial history the abrasions have carved away nearly the whole plantation, and eaten down three levees, costing the State and the proprietors more than $500,000."

THE QUESTION OF REPAIRS.

In nearly every portion of this country, and in fact of the civilized world, there is some provision of law in regard to the repairs of public roads. The county, town, city, and private corporation which is benefited by a highway invariably finds some way to keep it in repair. As the construction of these roads costs large sums of money, it is considered economical as well as necessary to take care of them. In brief, the statute law of every State compels the counties or towns to keep their roads in good repair, and the failure to do so subjects them to liability for damages caused by the neglect.

There is no good reason why the United States should not take equal care of the great interstate highways of commerce which she controls by legislation. As regards interstate commerce, communication, and exchanges between different sections of the nation, and between the interior and the seaboard, the uses of railways are very similar to those of river highways. It is therefore fair to contrast these two systems of highways as regards the question of repairs and damages.

The laws of the various States, particularly those which are the oldest and best settled, are very much alike in their requirements of railway corporations on the subject of damages and fences to protect adjoining property-holders from damage. To illustrate the spirit of the statute laws in this respect, we quote as follows from the laws of Connecticut:

"Every railroad company which has been incorporated since the first Wednesday of May, 1850, or which shall be hereafter incorporated, shall erect and maintain good and sufficient fences on both sides of its railroad throughout its whole extent, except at such places as, in the opinion of the railroad commissioners, the erection and maintenance of the same shall be inexpedient or unnecessary."

The statutes of this State further provide for the construction, by the railway companies, of "suitable cattle-guards in the form of culverts or pits at all places where its railroad shall cross public highways or passways."

In the construction of railways the companies are compelled to pay for the right of way, and to suitably compensate the land-owners whose property they cross for the damages caused. Such is also the spirit of the law in England. The general spirit of the law on this subject is concisely stated by Bouvier, as follows:

"In England the laying out of highways is regulated by act of Parliament: in this country by general statutes, differing in different States. In England the uniform practice is to provide a compensation to the owner of the land taken for highways. In the act authorizing the taking in the United States such a provision must be made or the act will be void, under the clause in the several State constitutions, that 'private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.'"

It is true that nature, instead of the United States, constructed the river highways. But is that a sufficient reason why the General Government, which controls the navigable waterways, should not protect the adjoining property-holders from damage? Equity requires that the general public which uses and is benefited by this national highway should fence it in by levees, so as to protect the adjoining fields from overflow and ruin. Congress has already established several precedents showing that it recognizes this general and universal spirit of the laws in regard to public highways and compensation for damages. They are as follows:

"The act of March 2, 1849, provides 'that, to aid the State of Louisiana in constructing the necessary levees and drains to reclaim the swamp and overflowed lands therein, the whole of those swamp and overflowed lands which may be or are found unfit for cultivation shall be, and the same are hereby, granted to that State.'

"The act of September 28, 1850, provides 'that, to enable the State of Arkansas to construct the necessary levees and drains to reclaim the swamp and overflowed lands therein, the whole of those swamp and overflowed lands made unfit thereby for cultivation which shall remain unsold at the passage of this act shall be, and the same are hereby, granted to said State.' Another section of this act extends its provisions and the grant of swamp lands to the other States of the valley and the Union.

"The act of September 30, 1850, provides 'for the topographical and hydrographical survey of the Delta of the Mississippi, with such investigations as may lead to determine the most practicable plan for securing it from inundation, and the best mode of so deepening the passes at the mouth of the river as to allow ships of twenty feet draught to enter the same, $50,000.'

"The act of August 31, 1852, provides 'for continuing the topographical and hydrographical survey of the Delta of the Mississippi, with such investigations as may lead to determine the most practicable plan for securing it from inundation, $50,000.'

"The act of March 12, 1860, provides 'that the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits," approved September 28, 1850, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the States of Minnesota and Oregon.'

"The act of June 22, 1874, provides 'that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to assign three officers of the Corps of Army Engineers, United States Army, and to appoint two civil engineers, eminent in their profession, and who are acquainted with the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River,' &c.

' " " " 'It shall be the duty of said commission to make a full report to the President of the best system for the permanent reclamation and redemption of said alluvial basin from inundation.'"

The total number of acres selected for the several States, under the provisions of the above-mentioned acts, is 67,683,045. Of that quantity granted, Florida, Oregon, California, and Michigan, States which are not intersected by any portion of the Mississippi River system, received 23,969,528 acres. Of the quantity received by the States interested in the Mississippi and its tributaries, the larger portion was within the alluvial districts dependent upon levees.

Such are the precedents which Congress has established in regard to the subject of alluvial lands. They are sufficiently numerous to indicate an admission by the General Government of an obligation to build levees or fences along its great highway of commerce, so as to protect adjoining fields from damage.

The precedents on the subject of river improvement are much more numerous. From the beginning of the Government to the year 1878 there have been nearly two hundred different appropriations by Congress for improvements of the Mississippi and its various tributaries. The total amount of these appropriations for improving 14,086 miles of water-ways in the Mississippi system, and which are under control of the United States, is not so remarkable as the number of the appropriations. The amount is in round numbers only $18,500,000, a sum only one-fifth the amount of bonds issued (with interest added) by the United States in favor of the Pacific railroads. It is an amount less than one-third the sum spent by New York State alone on her canals. It is also less than half the sum appropriated by Congress for the improvement of rivers and harbors in other portions of the United States.

A further comparison shows that the single State of New York has received from the General Government for the improvements of its rivers and harbors the sum of $7,894,603, an amount considerably over one-third the appropriations for the whole Mississippi system, in which eighteen States and two Territories have a business interest.

There is a wide difference in principle between the granting of Government aid in the construction of railways owned by private corporations and simply keeping in repair river highways controlled by the United States, and which nature built for her without expense. If precedents show that the General Government has pursued a very liberal policy in the first instance, it is certainly apparent that the policy should be liberal in regard to navigable rivers, the ways which furnish cheap and free transportation, and therefore the ways of greatest importance to the producers and the people who pay the taxes. According to the United States Bureau of Statistics, the amount of public lands granted in aid of the construction of railways is, up to the present time, 187,795,850 acres. The amount of bonds issued by the General Government to Pacific railways, with interest accumulated, was, at the beginning of last year, $91,637,928. The single State of New York has, as we have already shown, expended over $64,000,000 in the construction of artificial water-ways. The average cost per mile of those 1,308 miles of canal was $49,000. Suppose the General Government had, at the same cost per mile, constructed the 14,086 miles of water highways in the Mississippi River system, the total cost would be over $690,000,000. This river highway is infinitely superior to and more serviceable than any canal which can be constructed. Its value is just as great to the people as if built at public expense, and is as much entitled to repairs. Is it wise for the General Government to neglect its most important highway of commerce simply because nature assumed the cost of the original construction?

CONCLUSION.

The bill reported by your committee is a substitute for the various bills which have been referred to them for consideration.

By resolution of the present session the jurisdiction of the committee has been extended so as to include questions relating to the improvement of the river, as well as questions relating to levees and alluvial lands. In the past these have been rival interests, notwithstanding nature made them interdependent. At present, however, all parties in interest admit that levees are necessary aids to the improvement of navigation. Your committee therefore, in accordance with their new jurisdiction, and the fortunate adjustment of rival interests, report a bill combining those two very important questions.

Without advocating any particular theories—leaving them for a commission to determine—they do, however, recommend a liberal and comprehensive system of repairs to this great natural and national highway of commerce, which is under the control of the Government and open to the free and unrestrained use of the people.

As preliminary to such a system of internal improvements, they recommend a commission to examine and decide upon some adequate and comprehensive plan of improvement of the Lower Mississippi, from Saint Louis to the Gulf, which is the concentration and trunk line of the whole Mississippi River system. The bill provides that the commission shall take into consideration plans and estimates for the improvement of the navigation of the river as well as for the protection of the alluvial lands of the Mississippi Delta from overflow.

Mr. GIBSON. I offer as a substitute what I send to the desk. I ask that it may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be read now for information, but is not in order at the present time to be offered as an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That for the purpose of confining the Mississippi River to its channel, to improve its navigation, to facilitate trade and commerce, and to protect shipping and the country from its floods from the head of the passes of the Mississippi River to the mouth of the Illinois River, there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $2,500,000, to be expended by the Secretary of War in accordance with surveys and estimates made under his directions.

Mr. REAGAN. I give notice that at the proper time I will offer the amendment which I send to the desk and which I desire the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 6, by adding at the end of the section the following proviso:
Provided, That said commission shall also consider and report on the practicability of improving the navigation, deepening the channel, and redeeming the alluvial lands of said Mississippi River by means of opening new and additional outlets for the flow of the waters of said river into the Gulf of Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish at the outset to make an explanation with reference to the amendment reported from the committee making the appropriation. That amendment was offered by me in committee, and I was authorized to report it with the understanding that such members of the committee as might choose to do so reserved the right to oppose it. I have offered it as a member of the committee and the committee is not responsible for that amendment.

The bill under consideration, and which I had the honor to report from the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi, relates to a material question, and, I may truly say, one of unusual importance. It contemplates the improvement of the chief avenue of transportation of a great commercial nation. It also seeks to protect from floods and pestilence over twenty-six million acres of the most fertile and productive lands upon the face of the earth. It does not, as is so often alleged, aim at the reclamation of those lands or seek to perform work which properly belongs to the individual citizen. The word "reclamation" is not used in the bill. It is well that we understand the distinction at the outset of this discussion, for the wrong use and confusion of terms have given the opponents of river improvement an opportunity to misinterpret, and therefore misrepresent, the object we seek to accomplish. The word "reclamation" has furnished them with the key-note of unjust criticism. We simply ask protection from the frequent ravages of this great river, over which no power but the General Government has legal control, in order that we who possess lands along its course may have an opportunity to reclaim and cultivate them at our own expense. The protection we ask is similar in principle to that furnished by the General Government, through its Army and at national expense, against a warlike and dangerous enemy who would drive its citizens away from their legitimate and peaceful avocations. We ask protection from an enemy which we, as individuals and States, are powerless to oppose. We invoke the aid of that power whose fundamental principle is the protection of its citizens.

Nor does the bill raise the troublesome question of subsidy, the bare mention of which operates upon a portion of the press and public like an attack of nightmare. The improvement of this waterway is not in the nature of aid to individual property. The benefits resulting from the work proposed will not be confined to a private corporation, a city, town, county, State, or section, but will inure to the people of the whole country. It is the people's highway which we seek to improve—an avenue always open to their use, free of charge or restraint.

The means of accomplishing these two most important ends—improved navigation and protection of neighboring lands—are left for a commission of experts to determine. It would indeed be impossible for this House, or any other legislative body, to adjust and reconcile the many complicated and conflicting theories of improvement, for they involve problems of science too intricate for any but skilled engineers to solve. Some idea of the labor and intricacies attending the subject may be derived from the number and character of the bills relating to the Mississippi and its tributaries introduced in this House alone during the present Congress. The total number of bills to date is ninety-six. Of these, thirty-five relate to the Mississippi, twelve to the Missouri, four to the Ohio, six to the Red, six to the Tennessee, and the rest to the various other tributaries. The greater number aim at the improvement of the channels of the respective rivers composing the system. But some are based on other features, such as a canal to connect the Pacific Ocean with the Mississippi Valley, by way of the Upper Missouri and Columbia rivers. Another seeks to connect the valley with the lakes by a ship-canal uniting the Illinois River and Lake Michigan. Another would connect the valley with the Atlantic Ocean by means of a canal from Saint Mary's River, flowing between Florida and Georgia. Still another would establish reservoirs at the sources of the Mississippi, which would gather up surplus water in flood-time, to be reserved and used to supplement navigation in dry seasons. Several others are based solely upon protection of alluvial lands, ignoring the question of navigation.

This practice of distributing among a multitude of inharmonious bills the questions relating to a river system, which nature made interdependent and harmonious, to me seems extremely unwise. Only by a comprehensive view of the whole system can one understand and appreciate the defects and necessities of a part. Such comprehensive and intelligent action can be reached by enlarging the jurisdiction of the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi so as to include all of its tributaries throughout the length and breadth of the great valley. I trust such adequate jurisdiction will, at an early day, be provided for the committee. A bill relating to the Lower Mississippi, unlike any other part of this river system, necessarily involves the interests of all the tributaries, for it is the trunk-line of all the various branches flowing from the region of the lakes, the Alleghanies, and the Rocky Mountains. This, then, cannot be called a sectional bill. Here, as elsewhere, we find a multiplicity of theories covered by as many bills. They relate to the subject of alluvial lands, improved navigation, or both. Four have been introduced on the subject of lands alone; thirteen relating simply to navigation; seven which combine the two questions, and a few relating to the mouth of the river. One bill seeks to improve the mouth by building a wall across the bed sufficiently high to shut out the action of the Gulf waves, and yet leave over its top sufficient depth of water for purposes of navigation. Another seeks to protect the lands from overflow, and improve navigation by a series of outlets to tap and draw off the surplus waters, and by a diversion to the Gulf of some of the tributaries. There is another theory now pending, known as Captain Eads's plan, which is in direct conflict with the one last mentioned. It aims at both improved navigation and protection of lands from overflow by preserving the whole volume of water, and confining it within walls of uniform distance apart, so that the current may scour out and deepen the channel and lower the surface level. This theory is not embodied in a bill, but it is understood that it will be urged before the proposed commission.

The bill under consideration is based on no theory, but leaves it to skilled engineers to review the whole subject, unravel the net-work of rival theories, and determine which is the best. It relieves us of a difficult work which we have not time to perform, and which is too technical for and foreign to our jurisdiction. Our legitimate duties are already sufficiently numerous, and we should rather confine our attention to affairs of state than attempt legislative quackery with questions of engineering. It is for us to prescribe the object to be accomplished, leaving to others the means.

The necessity for improved navigation of the Mississippi was never more apparent than to-day. One of the most important questions now before the American people is foreign commerce. Instead of section against section and internal strife, which for a generation past has engrossed the attention of the national mind, consuming its energies, and nearly impoverishing the people, we have, thank Heaven! now reached the point in our history where the arts of peace and international commercial relations are stimulating our ambition for a wider field of action. Beginning with the year ending June 30, 1876, an appropriate year to inaugurate a new commercial departure, the balance of foreign trade in our favor was, in round numbers, $79,000,000; the next year it was $151,000,000, and the third year it was $257,000,000; and during the fourth or present fiscal year it will, judging from the official reports thus far made, considerably exceed $300,000,000.

By far the most important field for the further extension of our commerce, a field which heretofore has been unaccountably neglected and left for European commercial nations to monopolize, is that composed of the Spanish-American countries south of the Mississippi Valley. Those countries, in resources, supply, and demand, are the very reverse and complement of the United States, and therefore, according to all correct rules of political economy, their trade is the most important and valuable to us. With the press, chambers of commerce of various cities, and the people this new commercial movement is justly becoming very popular. It is indorsed by the State Department, which, as early as the summer of 1877, sent circular letters to the official representatives of the United States in those countries instructing them to investigate and report how enlarged commercial relations could best be promoted. It should also be the policy of this House to use every exertion to sustain and facilitate such a commendable policy.

The question, then, arises, how can we best extend aid? When we consider that eighteen States and two Territories are bordered or intersected by the navigable portions of the Mississippi and its tributaries, which, with a total of 14,086 miles of present navigation, converge, unite, and finally terminate at the Gulf of Mexico, at the very doors of the Spanish-American nations; when we consider that those eighteen States in 1876 produced 69 per cent. of the wheat, 87 per cent. of the corn, 72 per cent. of the rye, 74 per cent. of the cotton, and contained 71 per cent. in value of live hogs; when we consider further that one of the most important elements of successful foreign trade is cheap transportation from the great interior to the seaboard, we cannot fail to see that the mighty Mississippi, when freed from all obstructions, is a very important factor in extending our foreign commerce with the nations south of us.

Opposite the mouth of this river system, just across and half surrounding the Gulf, is the great Republic of Mexico, containing twenty-seven states and one territory, with a population nearly as great, in proportion to area, as that of the United States. It is the nearest, and, next to our own, the largest and richest of all republics. It abounds in silver, coffee, sugar, dye-stuffs, fancy woods, fruits, and other tropical products; but it is deficient in the class of products and manufactures which we have in excess. Mexico needs our railway-iron and supplies, mining machinery, agricultural implements, and the thousand and one articles of our manufacture, and will for years to come, or until she herself is adequately developed, demand what we can so easily supply. She annually spends several millions of dollars in purchasing cotton stuffs from distant Europe, when the finest cotton region of the world is near at hand along the Lower Mississippi. Her foreign commerce is almost entirely dependent upon water transportation, for there is not a single mile of railway connecting her with the United States or any other nation. Early this month an excursion, or pioneer party of merchants and manufacturers of Saint Louis, Chicago, Pittsburgh, New York, and other commercial centers, sailed from the mouth of the Mississippi to establish more intimate business relations with our Mexican neighbor.

When the proposed improvements of the Mississippi are accomplished the fertile States of the great valley and their industrial centers will have direct, easy, and cheap water communication with the principal ports of that country, and then we may hope for the extensive commercial intercourse which nature evidently intended should exist between the two republics.

The Empire of Brazil, the other states of South America, Central America, and the West Indies, also furnish attractive and inviting fields for our surplus products and manufactures. An official statement of the foreign trade of Brazil, published in 1876, shows that 85.29 per cent. of her demand is supplied by the markets of Europe, and only 4.67 per cent. by the United States. Here again can the Mississippi, when improved, play a leading part in developing American commerce. The total annual imports of those American nations south of us is, according to the statistics of the last attainable year, about $336,000,000. Of this large and growing demand the United States supplies only about $52,000,000, the lion's share being monopolized by European nations. We should, even at the present time, supply at least two-thirds of their demand, or $224,000,000, and double that sum in the near future when those lethargic nations awake to an adequate development of their resources, commerce, and brilliant possibilities.

It devolves upon the Mississippi Valley to take an active part in extending and enlarging that valuable branch of our foreign commerce, a commercial movement so correct in principle and so beneficial to the whole country. And she will perform her duty in that respect just so soon as her great river highway is unfettered and her steamers can find continuous navigation along the Mississippi and through the Gulf of Mexico to the ports of those nations.

One of the highest authorities on the subject of cheap transportation, Senator WINDOM, recently said, in speaking of the improvement of the Mississippi:

> I entertain no doubt whatever that, when the improvements contemplated shall be finished, the charges from Saint Louis to New Orleans will not exceed 3 to 4 cents per bushel, with probabilities even below that small figure; and 6 to 8 cents from Saint Paul to New Orleans, and even 18 to 20 cents from Saint Paul to Liverpool, may be confidently expected.

During the year 1878, just ended, the average rate of transportation by river from Saint Louis to New Orleans was, for a bushel of wheat, about 7⅛ cents. During the same year the average rate of transportation of wheat from Chicago to the seaboard at New York was, by way of the lakes and canal, 10⅝ cents; in 1876 it was 10 cents; in 1875, 11 cents; in 1874, 13 cents; in 1873, 19 cents; and in 1872, 24 cents. The rate between the same points by rail was, in 1878, 16½ cents; 1876, 17 cents; 1875, 24 cents; 1874, 28 cents; and in 1873, 33 cents. These differences in rate of transportation from the great centers of the valley to the seaboard range all the way from 4 to 30 cents per bushel. The total number of bushels of corn and wheat combined produced in the eighteen States making use to a greater or less extent of the navigable portions of the Mississippi system was, in 1878, 1,324,000,000. Now, suppose one-half of that product had to be transported to the seaboard at New Orleans at a saving of 5 cents per bushel, by virtue of the proposed improvement of the river, the total annual saving to the producers and consumers on these two articles alone would be over $33,000,000.

Such facts and figures speak for themselves, and it needs no extended argument to demonstrate the new impetus which would be given increased production and enlarged exportations by putting in an adequate state of repair our most important line of water transportation. These two great questions, cheap transportation and foreign trade, are of more importance to the people than the kind of money we shall use, what our banking system shall be, or who shall be President. They are questions most intimately associated with the great Mississippi, which we ask to have improved.

Turning to the other feature of the bill, alluvial lands, I might urge the almost fabulous additions to the taxable wealth of the country resulting from their protection by the Government, and consequent reclamation by the owners—the enormous increase of our corn, rice, cotton, and sugar crops, which the cultivation of those prolific lands would cause—the annual saving to crops, buildings, and stock, by protection from the floods and the desirability of closing the outlets in the levees, which the amendment to the bill proposes as a temporary relief, until the commission can provide for permanent protection. But those points were considered in the report accompanying this bill, which I submitted last session, and in a speech in support of the bill as amended.

Since then another question, peculiarly and intimately associated with the Lower Mississippi, has stalked before the public, carrying with it death and destruction. I refer to the terrible pestilence whose ravages were chiefly confined to the black belt, from thirty to one hundred and fifty miles wide, and over one thousand long, extending from Cairo to the Gulf, and which represents on the river maps the alluvial, overflowed, and insufficiently drained district. Regardless of conflicting theories concerning the origin of yellow fever, it is a fact that in the United States the disease is chiefly confined to this alluvial district, which is subject to overflow and subsequently to stagnant water and rank vegetation steaming and festering under a hot sun. My personal observation upon the banks of the Lower Mississippi, where I have lived since 1825, has been that whenever the fever raged to any great extent it followed such conditions. The pestilence of 1829 followed the overflow of 1828; that of 1847, the overflow of 1844; that of 1853, the overflow of 1848, 1849, 1850, and 1851; that of 1867, the overflow and early subsidence of the flood of that year; and that of 1878, so fearful in its proportions, the overflow of 1874, and the high waters of 1875, 1876, and 1877, which floods were succeeded by extreme low water and the dry, hot summer, leaving the stagnant water of the marshes and decaying vegetation to exude poisonous gases and help propagate the fever.

It is also a fact, that when the alarm is first sounded the health officers and other officials of the cities and towns along the river, instead of lingering to discuss fine-drawn theories, take immediate steps to improve their drainage, remove the garbage, and transform those places from a state of filth to one of cleanliness. The alluvial district is a settlement upon a large and more extended scale, and if it were within the bounds of reason, its citizens would themselves in times of pestilence perfect its drainage and remove the unwholesome vegetation. But, as I have before remarked, there must first be protection from overflow, and that is a work too formidable for individual citizens or States. It is an interstate improvement which requires the purse and legal supervision of the General Government. The protection of those lands from the floods will, however, enable the individual owners to clear, drain, and cultivate them and keep them free from impurities. If the improvement proposed by this bill will result in protecting the health and lives of the people dwelling along the Lower Mississippi, the subject is indeed one of momentous importance, and calls for our earliest action.

In addition to the loss of life, the pecuniary damage to commerce and other industries during the single season just ended, and as a result of the fever, was many millions of dollars. It has been estimated to be two hundred millions. It certainly is a very low and safe estimate to say that such damage exceeds the total cost of improvement on the most expensive plan proposed, or $50,000,000. The forthcoming report on the subject of the fever, by a select committee of this House, will give more definite information. But they will simply report the facts for our further action. The proposed commission on the Mississippi, however, will report how those facts should be applied, and the alluvial district, or hot-bed of the pestilence, drained and purified and made serviceable to the health and industries of the people along the lower river.

Consideration for the people of the North, whose boundless generosity during the recent pestilence so tenderly ministered to the afflicted people of the South, is another reason why Congress should afford this necessary legislation. It is nothing less than imposition to periodically throw this excessive burden of relief upon charitable individuals of the North when the scourge arises from a defective and neglected national sewer concerning which no power but Congress has the right to legislate. Humanity, as well as pecuniary considerations, dictates that we give early and careful attention to this imperative duty devolving upon us.

There is also a political reason why the great river should always be kept in good repair. It is a natural bond of union between the North and the South, which should be strengthened by continual use for purposes of commerce and friendly intercourse. It was a favorite policy of Washington to unite the James River with the Ohio, by means of a canal, to bind the Mississippi Valley to the original thirteen States, and prevent it from falling under the domination of a foreign power. It was the policy of Congress, a few years since, to aid in the construction of a railway to connect the Pacific States with the rest of the Union with bands of steel. Nature, at her own expense, constructed the connecting link between the North and South. It would indeed be sacrilege on our part to ignore and neglect its use.

It may seem a broad assertion, nevertheless it is a fact, that the Mississippi has not even been surveyed in a comprehensive manner. While De Soto and his Spanish comrades discovered the river three hundred and thirty-eight years ago, we, who claim to be progressive, have not yet discovered how to utilize it. The surveys which have been made were restricted to some particular feature or section of the river. That known as Humphreys and Abbot's survey, under the acts of Congress of 1850 and 1852, was a "topographical and hydrographical survey of the Delta of the Mississippi, with such investigations as may lead to determine the most practicable plan for securing it from inundation and the best mode of so deepening the passes at the mouth of the river," &c. That provided for by the act of June 22, 1874, was "to make a full report to the President of the best system for the permanent reclamation and redemption of said alluvial basin from inundation." The important subject of improved navigation has been ignored. Such one-sided legislation is like the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out. It is a consummate farce and a very costly one to the people.

In this material age when the whole scientific world is advancing upon the latent forces of nature, discovering and subjecting them to the service and welfare of mankind, it will be a discredit to us to longer delay the solution of this river problem. The people North, South, East, and West, are losing interest in political strife, and demand of us, their representatives, such action as will be conducive to their industrial and commercial advancement. The politicians may attempt to manufacture a "solid South," or a "solid North," but the people care more for a solid country, alive to the grand opportunities of the day for increased commerce, both internal and international.

As preliminary to such a consummation the improvement of the Mississippi becomes of transcendent importance. It is a motive power of too great magnitude to be longer neglected.

I had intended, sir, to close my remarks here, but in view of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] I desire to offer a few remarks in addition to what I have already said.

Let it be understood, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment which I offered and which is a part of the bill under consideration, does not antagonize the other sections of the bill, but simply carries out the policy provided for in the sixth section, under which commissioners are to report the temporary repairs, or work necessary to be done to close the outlets and to raise and strengthen the present line of levees on the Mississippi River.

That amendment does not antagonize; on the contrary, in my opinion, it carries out the provisions of the bill. Now I propose to show that there is but one theory that does oppose the bill, and that is the theory known as Captain Cowden's, or "the outlet system."

At this session of Congress that gentleman had introduced a bill for the purpose of carrying out his views, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and that committee has taken jurisdiction of this matter.

I propose, then, sir, for the purpose of refuting the theory of Captain Cowden, to state simply that although it seems to have attracted attention all over the country it is not a new theory. Why, sir, it is as old as the earliest settlements of this country when there were a thousand outlets all along the river. It was the policy of the earliest settlers to close them, and now these outlets have been closed and levees built.

The outlets closed were the Bayous Jacob and Manchac in 1826, and the Bayou Plaquemines in 1865. At a much earlier date than 1826 the Bayou Goula and the innumerable small bayous leading from the Mississippi River into Lake Clause, both mouths of False River, the Fordoche, Latinash, and many other smaller outlets, too numerous to mention, were closed below the mouth of Red River.

After 1827, when the levee system was extended above the mouth of Red River, the same system of diking and closing the outlets on both sides of the river was pursued; and when that system was completed, and formed an almost unbroken levee system from the Gulf to Commerce, in the State of Missouri, we find the flood levels of high water not at all increased, for it is well known that levees built one hundred years ago below the mouth of Red River are still standing intact, not having been increased in height a single inch.

The highest water we ever had was in 1828 (when we had comparatively no levees above Red River) except the flood of 1874, when at Baton Rouge it was eighteen inches higher than was ever known before; and yet, strange to say, it was six feet lower at Natchez than in 1867. This was probably caused by the accumulation of crevasse water coming down from Arkansas and upper Louisiana uniting with the extraordinary floods in the Ouachita and Red Rivers to so great an extent that it could not be carried off by the Atchafalaya River, and poured back into the Mississippi River through the mouth of Old River, causing a sudden rise at that point of fourteen inches in twenty-four hours; and in consequence of this the Morganza and other levees gave way, and still in no instance did the water run over the tops of levees, the grade of which had been established years before. As an exception, at one point in West Baton Rouge the water did go over the levees, because the original grade had not been kept up.

Now Captain Cowden proposes to reopen the outlets closed by our levee system and create new ones for the purpose of lowering the flood level and improving the navigation. Why the opening of these outlets will reduce the flood level, when, as I have shown, the closing of them did not increase it, I cannot see. In the first place you cannot make these outlets above the mouth of Red River, as the water must return to the Mississippi River again, as in the case of crevasses, and these crevasses fully demonstrate at this time their effects upon the country.

Now, does not the House know that within the last forty years outlets have been made which take off a large percentage of the waters of the Mississippi through Cubit's Gap and the enlargement of the Atchafalaya. Cubit's Gap was cut during the late war to afford an outlet for fishing-boats into an arm of the Gulf of Mexico. At first it was but a small canal, but now so enlarged in proportions as to threaten the success of Eads's jetties by cutting off water needed for scouring out the bars at South Pass.

As to the Atchafalaya, previous to 1839 a raft for twenty miles dammed and completely blocked this river almost as effectually as if it had been diked, and closing its navigation. At this time, at low water the mouth of the Atchafalaya was entirely dry, and no water from the Red or Mississippi Rivers passed down it. In the fall of 1839, which was an extraordinarily dry season, this raft which had completely blocked up the Atchafalaya from its top to its bottom, was set fire to and burnt out. The State then cleared out the débris. Instantly the waters of the Red River and the Old River poured into the Atchafalaya and it began to scour out its bottom, and the banks tumbled in by the acre; and it has been going on to increase in width and depth until now it has enlarged six hundred feet in width and deepened eighty feet in depth, as shown by recent soundings.

And now, sir, I think the proposition of Captain Cowden to divert the Red River is too late. The gentlemen of the Committee on Commerce and others who have examined this matter should have at least known that Red River is no longer a tributary of the Mississippi. In 1831 the bend into which the Red and Atchafalaya connected the first as a tributary and the other as an outlet was cut off from the main river, and is now known as Old River; and as a consequence the Red River has been drawn into the enlarged channel of the Atchafalaya, and is no longer a tributary of the Mississippi River, only contributing to that stream at high water a surplus not yet provided for by the natural enlargement of the Atchafalaya, because of crevasses above occurring at the same time and uniting with Red River.

At the last session, Congress appropriated $150,000 for the improvement of the mouth of Red River, and the plan of the United States engineers is to bring back from the Atchafalaya a portion of the water of the Red River, through the Old River, into the Mississippi for purposes of navigation, showing conclusively that the diversion I have referred to had caused the bottom to rise into bars, and is now again to be used to cut out these shoals and improve the navigation.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that I am trespassing upon theories when I say that the levee system improves the navigation of the river. The levee system tends to deepen the channel of a river and keep it from being obstructed by the natural accumulations of a river like the Mississippi, consequently when we built the levees the navigation was improved.

Now, it is shown that the velocity of a stream is increased by confining it between levees, and consequently this velocity acts as a dredge and prevents the accumulation of sediment; and I made the assertion at the last session of Congress that whenever a large crevasse occurred, thereby depleting the river and checking the current, you choke up the river below.

That proposition has never been successfully refuted. Wherever soundings have been made that fact has been established. I am confirmed to-day in that opinion by the surveys which have recently been made by the Coast Survey. And I assert that the diversion of the waters of the Red River into and down the Atchafalaya River, and the consequent enlargement of the channel of the Atchafalya, thus forming one of the largest outlets, except Cubit's Gap, has shoaled the channel of the river below. By the soundings at the mouth of the Red River it is found that the depth of the channel of the Mississippi River was one hundred and twenty-six feet. At Baton Rouge, seventy-five miles below, the depth of the channel was one hundred and three feet, showing that by means of this tremendous outlet of the Mississippi, taking off at least one-tenth of the volume of the water of the Mississippi, the current is checked to such an extent that the bottom of the river below the mouth of the Red River has been filled up twenty-three feet.

I assert positively that the building of levees does improve the navigation of the river. The banks cave in, it is true; but I am satisfied that increased velocity of the current also deepens the channel by scouring the bottom. The trouble is to prevent these banks from caving.

Engineers have not gone into that subject. The commission of 1874 simply reported the fact that the town of Saint Joe and the town of Natchez-under-the-hill were protected by breakwaters. They dismissed that subject with a few words by saying that such a system would cost too much. I doubt whether it would cost one-half of what the plan recommended by that commission would cost for building a new line of levees a mile or more back of the present levees.

Now, I am opposed to their scheme, because it will fence out and leave to the mercies of the floods sixteen hundred square miles of the best improved lands on the Mississippi River, the open lands and buildings where the front proprietors reside.

I have therefore offered this amendment, based upon estimates by the Engineer Corps, on my own responsibility, because I believe it ought to pass. I think I have already presented sufficient argument to show that you must close the outlets and at least repair the levees and raise and strengthen them until this commission can act upon some permanent plan for the improvement of the river and protection of the alluvial lands.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.]

Mr. ELLIS. Before the gentleman from Mississippi proceeds, I desire to offer a substitute for the pending bill and to have the substitute read.

Mr. CHALMERS. I will yield for that purpose, if it is not taken out of my time.

The Clerk read the substitute as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the sum of $4,850,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of repairing and rebuilding the levees of the Mississippi River, thereby reclaiming from inundation by its waters the alluvial lands of its Delta, deepening its channel for commercial purposes, closing its crevasses, and thereby protecting and promoting its commerce, as follows, to wit:

Seventy-five thousand dollars in the State of Illinois.
Five hundred thousand dollars in the State of Missouri.
One hundred thousand dollars in the State of Tennessee.
One million two hundred and eighty thousand dollars in the State of Arkansas.
One million one hundred thousand dollars in the State of Mississippi.
One million eight hundred thousand dollars in the State of Louisiana.

SEC. 2. That the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War, shall have sole and exclusive direction of the work to be performed and the expenditures to be made under the provisions of this act; that as soon as practicable after the passage of this act, and after proper advertisement by the Secretary of War, upon estimates to be furnished by the Chief of Engineers, the work herein provided for shall be let to the lowest bidder or bidders, in such sections and quantities as the Chief of Engineers may deem proper; that such contractors or bidders, before they enter upon their contracts, shall furnish bond, with good and solvent sureties, in favor of the United States, in an amount equal to one-third of their entire contract, for the faithful performance of the work contracted for; and in no case shall the full amount agreed upon be paid to any contractor; and until his entire contract is performed and the work done under it surveyed and accepted by the Chief Engineer, or some officer designated by him, 20 per cent. of said entire amount shall be retained; after which survey and acceptance, the residue of 20 per cent. shall be paid to said contractor.

SEC. 3. That all estimates required, and all surveys, plans, and locations of said levees, and for their construction, shall be made by the Chief of Engineers, or under his direction by such engineers of the corps as he may designate, or by such citizen civil engineers as he may see fit to employ.

SEC. 4. That no portion of the moneys herein appropriated shall ever be applied to the payment of any debts or obligations incurred by any State or other local levee company or corporation or authority, nor for compensation for any work other than that performed under the provisions of this act, nor for any other purpose than that contemplated and provided for herein.

SEC. 5. That on or before the 1st day of January, 1877, the Secretary of War shall submit to Congress a full and complete report of the manner in which the work contemplated by this act has been performed, and in what manner the moneys herein appropriated have been expended.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I shall not trouble the committee with any lengthened argument on this question. The whole subject, including the vast extent of wealth-producing territory to be reclaimed, the best method of reclamation, and the constitutional power of the Government to reclaim it, has been so fully and so ably discussed by gentlemen of practical experience, scientific knowledge, and legal ability, that I shall not attempt to do anything more than group together the arguments that have been advanced by others.

During the administration of President Taylor, himself a Louisiana planter and deeply interested in the question, the first resolutions were passed in the Senate of the United States directing a survey of the Mississippi River expressly to ascertain the best method of reclaiming the alluvial lands of the Mississippi Valley. This, after many years, resulted in the able and exhaustive report of Humphreys and Abbott, Chief Engineers of the United States Army, who emphatically declare that the levee system is the best method of accomplishing this purpose.

In furtherance of this object the United States donated the swamp lands lying in Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, which were of no value without protection from overflow, to these respective States to assist in building up their levees. The funds arising from these lands were small and soon exhausted, and millions of their own money were expended by these States in the creation of levees under State legislation. The levees thus constructed were just being tested and were more or less successful in different places when the war came on and large portions of them were destroyed; some by the attrition of wagons and horses, when they were used as a road-bed; some by the erosion of the water, aided by the paddle-wheels of steamers in high tide; and some directly by the Army and Navy of the United States. Mississippi and Louisiana have expended large sums of money since the war to repair their levees, but experience has shown that they have not the pecuniary strength to accomplish this great work as individual States, and that they are prohibited by the Constitution of the United States from forming combinations with each other or other States to create a uniform system of levees, which is essential to their protection. They have therefore appealed to the United States Government to take charge of the work and give to them that protection which every citizen is entitled to claim at the hands of the government to which he yields obedience and which he pays taxes to support.

There are many gentlemen in this House who have expressed a desire to vote aid to the Mississippi levees if they could do so consistently with their ideas of constitutional duty. I propose, therefore, briefly to show that there are more clauses of the Constitution under which, as construed by the judgments of courts and precedents of practice, the Government can construct the Mississippi levees than there are to support any other work of internal improvement it has ever undertaken. I look first to the power to regulate commerce. Under this power the Government has built light-houses, buoys, and piers for the warning, guidance, and protection of vessels against danger, and has established a life-saving service, prompted by humanity and sanctioned by success. It has constructed breakwaters, which are, under another name, expensive levees for the protection of property behind them. It has cleaned out natural harbors and made artificial harbors where there were none. It has cleaned out rivers and dug canals to create commerce where there was none. The Mississippi River is the greatest artery of internal commerce in the world, and yet it is filled with snags and sand-bars that are the deposit of its annual overflows, which not only destroy vessels, but tax the whole commerce of the West with an increase of insurance that is destructive to prosperity.

It is claimed by scientific men, and I believe truly, that when the water of the Mississippi is permitted to spread over a large surface the velocity of its current is checked; it makes deposits of sediment and snags, creates sand-bars, and obstructs navigation; and that, on the other hand, the concentration of the water into a narrow stream will increase the velocity so that it will remove the sand-bars, clean out the snags, deepen the channel, and improve navigation. If this be true, as the reports of scientific engineers declare and as the action of the jetties seems to demonstrate, then the construction of the levees, which would confine into a stream one mile wide water that would spread over forty miles without them, must conduce to the benefit of navigation and commerce; and we might rest our claim for power to construct levees under that clause of the Constitution.

We look next to the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads." Under this power we find that the Government has opened dirt roads, built bridges and causeways, and constructed turnpikes, in the early days of the Republic, and in later days has built railroads and telegraph lines, established postal-cars, fast mail-routes, and letter-carriers, who deliver their mail to the merchant princes of the cities at their door-steps. The Mississippi River is the greatest natural post-route in the Union, and when there is no overflow the mails are delivered at every post-office on its banks. If railroads and telegraph lines can be built under this power, and the Supreme Court of the United States has said they can, to distribute mails where no post-routes previously existed, certainly levees, which are but embankments of earth, scarcely more expensive than the embankment alone of railroads, can be built on this great natural post-route to enable its inhabitants to receive their mail on dry land and not in the midst of water forty miles wide. We might therefore rest our claim for power to construct levees on this clause of the Constitution. We turn next to the clause which gives to the General Government power "to provide for the common defense and general welfare." Under this clause we find that it has been the practice of the Government to levy high duties on articles of foreign commerce, ostensibly to raise revenue, but in effect to protect what are called "American industries." One political party has contended it was the duty of the Government so to regulate its tariff as to protect American industry. The other party, to which I belong, has denied the power or the duty of the Government to pass a purely protective tariff, but admitted that a strictly revenue tariff would afford incidental protection to American industry. Among the most important industries of the United States is the cotton and sugar cultivation in the Mississippi Valley—a vast mine of undeveloped agricultural wealth, capable of supplying the Union with sugar and the world with cotton, if protected from overflow, but which is often submerged for weeks and months by the wide-spreading floods of the Mississippi River.

Mr. DUNNELL. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] should address the Chair. He has been addressing that side of the House only, and we on this side are unable to hear what he is saying.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. He wants to convince the members on his own side.

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes. I know that the gentlemen on the other side are sensible and liberal men and do not need to be convinced of the necessity and importance of this measure. I am anxious to convince those on my side of the House. [Laughter.] However, I will speak so as to be heard by gentlemen on either side of the Hall.

If it is the duty of the Government to protect American industry this should unquestionably be protected. Long staple cotton is eminently American, and brings more gold to the country than all the other protected articles together; and I appeal to our protective friends, and especially my handsome friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WRIGHT,] the most available greenback candidate for the Presidency in 1880, to come to our assistance and the support of his own doctrines. [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT rose and bowed to the speaker. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CHALMERS. If, on the other hand, the Government, in the exercise of its acknowledged power to regulate commerce or establish post-routes, adopts such plans as those set out in the bill now under consideration to improve the commerce and navigation of the Mississippi River, and in so doing affords incidental protection to its alluvial lands, no one—not even my esteemed friend from Illinois, [General EDEN,] though a democrat of the strictest sect of objectors—could possibly object. We might therefore well claim that the common defense provided for in the Constitution would include the defense of people who are helpless against the great floods of the Mississippi River, and that the general welfare would be promoted by protecting and increasing crops which have turned the balance of trade in our favor. And we can make the claim all the more confidently because under this or some other power, or all the powers granted in the Constitution combined, the General Government has already established the precedent of granting aid to the building of levees. Thirty years ago it donated lands for this purpose, and if it had the constitutional power to give lands it has the power to give money. It has time and again ordered surveys of the river to be made, at considerable expense, for the express purpose of determining the best method and the cost of protecting the alluvial lands. These reports are all now in, showing that the levee system is the best method and that the cost of repairing the levees now standing is precisely the sum which this bill asks to be appropriated.

To hesitate now to adopt the recommendations of the engineer upon the ground that there is no authority for making the appropriation is a censure and repudiation of all the various acts of legislation which ordered these reports. We look next to the power which the Government has, arising out of its exclusive jurisdiction over the waters of the Mississippi River. We do not assent to the doctrine that the Government possesses any peculiar rights over the Mississippi River by reason of the fact that we acquired a portion of it by purchase.

The lands adjacent were purchased at the same time and in the same manner as the waters, and yet the States subsequently organized out of this territory acquired the same right of eminent domain that belongs to any other State of the Union. The riparian proprietors in Arkansas and Louisiana have the same rights over the Mississippi River as those in Kentucky and Indiana have over the Ohio. But the Supreme Court of the United States, after a contest over the subject for many years, has determined that the United States, through its district courts, has exclusive jurisdiction over all the navigable waters of the Union. The States of Mississippi and Louisiana therefore find themselves in this condition: after spending every dollar they could tax from their people or borrow from others to repair their levees, and after having passed stringent laws to prevent their own people from riding or driving on them, lest in time of high water the jar thus produced might create a crevasse, they have sometimes been compelled to see their levees broken by the landing of some steamboat against them when the water was nearly level with the top, or by the paddle-wheels of some great steamer in mid-river, and witness the destruction of their property as the waters poured over it. But the States have no right to protect themselves against these injuries, because they cannot interfere with the commerce of the Union. Again, it is the belief of many that the clearing up of the new States on the headwaters of the Mississippi have precipitated the floods with more violence on the country below; and while the States below would not desire to prevent this, it affords them just ground for demanding relief from the strong hand of the Union. Again, any State may erect perfect levees along its whole river front and still be subjected to inundation through another State. Arkansas may be overflowed through Missouri, Mississippi through Tennessee, and Louisiana through Arkansas; and, while neither can protect itself, they cannot combine for their mutual protection, because this is forbidden by the Constitution.

The General Government alone has the power to do this; it has the means to give protection, and it has exclusive jurisdiction over the Mississippi and its tributaries; and gentlemen should remember that every power carries with it a corresponding duty. The duty in this case is that the United States Government should so use its property in this river as not to injure the property of others. It has exclusive control over this river, and should so control it as not to permit it to deluge the riparian owners. It has exclusive power to regulate the commerce of the Mississippi River, and it should so regulate it that its wheels shall not destroy millions of agricultural wealth. It has exclusive power to establish post-offices and post-routes on the Mississippi River, and it should so establish them that the mail can be delivered to the inhabitants on its bank; if not at their doorsteps, where the inhabitants of cities receive their letters from the hands of carriers, at least to men on dry ground, and not to raftsmen floating on the water. The Government collects revenue and gives protection to iron and manufactures; let it deepen the channel of the Mississippi River, by wing-dams in low water and levees in high water, and thus improve its commerce and navigation and at the same time give incidental protection to the great sugar and cotton producing industries in its valley.

The Government, by a long line of precedents, has built breakwaters to protect sea-coast cities from the inroads of the ocean. Let it build breakwaters to protect the riparian owners of the Lower Mississippi from what Mr. Calhoun called "a great inland sea," whose waters have built up an empire which its floods threaten to destroy.

If gentlemen will look to any one of these powers, it ought to be sufficient to satisfy the conscience of the most obdurate politician, democrat or republican, whose political life has depended on a war against subsidies; and when we look to all combined, it ought to be sufficient to overcome the conscientious scruples and soften even the hard-hearted souls of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Levees and the Improvement of the Mississippi River has had intrusted to it during the present session the consideration of subjects connected with the protection of the Mississippi River and of the alluvial lands of the Mississippi Delta. In the discharge of our duty it has been necessary for us to hear many persons, to listen to various theories, and to read many comments, and opinions upon the whole subject. As a result of long deliberation on the part of the committee, we have brought before the House the bill which is now under consideration.

I allude only to the first nine sections of the bill; the remaining two sections are not a part of the bill reported from the committee. For fear that the chairman of the committee [Mr. ROBERTSON] may not have been distinctly heard when giving his account of that amendment, if the Committee of the Whole will bear with me I will state that it is simply a proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] alone; and that the committee agreed that he might offer it and that a vote might be taken upon it in the House. I wish to say that several members of the committee besides myself are utterly opposed to the proposed sections ten and eleven, and I myself should vote against the whole bill should those sections become a part thereof.

I need not go over the wants of the commerce of the Mississippi Valley to speak of the twenty millions of people that are accommodated by the great traffic upon that rolling stream. I need not allude either to the fact that nearly a score of States and Territories of this Union are interested in the commerce upon that river and upon its tributaries. That knowledge is within the reach of every school-boy in the land.

I propose to address myself only to the practical features of this bill. What are we trying to do here? The first nine sections of the bill propose to establish a permanent commission whose duty it shall be to investigate the whole system bearing upon the navigation of that river and the protection of the alluvial lands of its Delta. That commission is to be constituted of three engineer officers of the Army, one of whom shall be its president, and of two persons taken from civil life who may be conversant with and experienced in the wants of the commerce of the Mississippi Valley. No money whatever is called for by the first nine sections of this bill, except that required to pay the expenses of the survey. We are now from year to year spending varying sums under the charge of the War Department and of the Coast Survey in examinations of the Mississippi River. It seemed wise to your committee that all this work of examination and investigation should be combined; that it should be put in the charge of one body of men, and that we should not go on by piecemeal from year to year, having separate and distinct reports from these departments, without coming to any definite conclusion. Therefore, this commission is authorized to take charge of all the surveys now in progress upon the river, also to complete the surveys requisite for the purposes embraced in the bill.

Further, this commission must report to Congress before any action can be had upon its plans or specifications, and no work can be done until those plans are approved by Congress. It seemed, therefore, to your committee that this bill provides a safeguard against any extravagant expenditures on the part of the Government. In the sixth section of the bill it is provided that this commission may make a partial report, provided a majority of them, including the president of the commission, shall consent to such report, such partial report to refer to the protection of the alluvial lands of the river.

The committee have found those two subjects to be interdependent. They have not seen in the investigation they have given that the one stands necessarily apart from the other. All the writers and all the engineers from whom they have heard declare that in some measure, greater or less, the protection of the lands has also an influence upon the navigable character of the river. Therefore it seemed proper that this commission, before completing fully the plan, should submit to Congress a report, subject to its approval and action.

Perhaps that is all I ought to say of the bill in its main features, because that is all there is of it—a provision that a sufficient sum of money shall be provided at present to meet the demands of the survey—nothing further.

Now, it is proposed to add to this bill two sections constituting an amendment; and as I said at the outset I am utterly opposed to that amendment, or to any amendment of that character. Sections 10 and 11 commit this Congress at the outset, regardless of the determination of the commission, to the policy of rebuilding the levees along the line of the Mississippi River. Gentlemen of the committee, upon examination of the first nine sections of the bill proper, will find that Congress is not by them committed at all to that theory, but that the whole subject is left open for investigation and subsequent determination. Then these amendments contemplate that Congress should appropriate about $4,000,000 at once, which shall become available to carry out somebody's theory that the levees in the Southern States along the Mississippi River ought to be rebuilt and restored. Your committee, Mr. Chairman, have not come to the conclusion that such is the duty of Congress or the demand of the country at the present time, however much the people of the States immediately interested may demand it, or however strongly gentlemen representing the various districts in those States may feel moved to declare here their advocacy of that plan. The committee do not recommend it. Why? It will be seen at a glance that this proposition to constitute a commission which shall take the whole subject under consideration and report thereon to Congress at a subsequent session, is supplemented by one that commits us to one of the plans which must come before the commission. In other words, you tie the hands of the commission at the outset; you pre-occupy all ground; you make your commission of no effect or consequence whatever.

Why, sir, these amendments go so far as to put the construction and repair of those levees, not in the hands of the commission, but in the hands of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, neither of whom is to be a member of the commission. These officers are to go on and expend money for this work which is all to be under the charge simply of one engineer appointed for that purpose. Therefore I say that these two sections are in no way in harmony with the general purposes of this bill. In fact it will be seen at once that if this work be carried on by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War under these amendments, the whole object of the first part of the bill is interfered with and prevented.

Again, we had before us, and there are now before this Committee of the Whole, in discussion various theories which commend themselves to different gentlemen with varying degrees of force. I am led to believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is not on this floor any man who sees this whole subject through and through, who understands thoroughly the mighty problems connected with that river and valley. I find as a matter of fact that gentlemen who represent the States along the Mississippi Valley are not agreed upon those theories. I find members upon this floor who say, for instance, that one-half of a district represented in this Congress is in favor of the levee system and another half utterly opposed to it. Then, the people even in that neighborhood are not agreed. There are various plans, as I have said; notably the plan of keeping the river within the limits of its natural banks for all time, bringing down its flood-line so that the body of water shall be set to work upon the bottom or bed of the river, thereby rendering it unnecessary that these walls of mud alongside the river should be carried up and up into the air, perhaps for the immediate protection of the land but to the certain terror of everybody living in that neighborhood thereafter.

It must be known that this is the theory of Captain Eads. Whether or not he makes a final or perfect success at the pass of the Mississippi River, where he is now operating, he certainly has accomplished enough to challenge our patience and our investigation of his theories. He says that he would lower the current of the river so that it should be within the natural banks, thereby rendering the levees useless. I find his ideas on this subject expressed in some remarks submitted by him in New Orleans last year. I ask the Clerk to read a passage which I have marked, in order that it may be understood that this is a theory advocated by a gentleman prominent in the scientific world, and one who has been intrusted by Congress with the money of the Treasury.

The Clerk read as follows:

I am satisfield that if the volume below Red River were increased, as it would be by closing Atchafalaya and compelling Red River to seek the sea by way of your city, it would lower the flood-line five or six feet at the mouth of Red River and more than two feet at New Orleans.

The same reasoning assures me that closing all gaps and crevasses in the levees, and thus increasing the volume in the natural channel, will not necessitate higher levees, and hence the estimate of $46,000,000 is very excessive and unreliable, because it is based on the idea of raising them from three to eleven feet higher than before the war. The great objection to the levee system is not from the present amount needed for absolute protection from the near floods, because four or five million dollars would insure this; but it is the incessant destruction of them which must ensue from the cause I have named. Remove that cause and the levees can be cheaply maintained, but when the cause of the caving banks is removed we will find the flood-slope lowered and levees useless.

It will be seen that this system is radically different from that advocated by the levee commission, by Humphreys, Abbot, Warren, Hebert, and engineers of lesser fame, who adopt the theory that there is no relation between the velocity of current and amount of sediment carried, because they have invariably compared the velocity per second with the sediment contained in a cubic foot of water, and not with the total amount carried by the whole river in each respective second of time that the velocity is noted.

They advocate the diffusion of water by outlets and raising high levees around the wide places. I advocate its conservation, every drop of it, in one channel of uniform width, and the abolition of all the wide places; the closure of the outlets, every one of them, and, if found necessary, the closure of the island chutes. They propose to attack the banks of the river with shovel and wheelbarrow to accommodate its anticipated elevation ten or a dozen feet higher than ever before. I propose to set the river to work in the bottom of its bed, as we did at the jetties, and, while deepening it for the benefit of commerce, lower its haughty crest forever. They provide for a river carried threateningly above the land, a constant source of terror and anxiety, while I propose that its vast volume, in all the grandeur of its mightiest floods, shall be viewed with an admiration devoid of fear, from happy homes safe above its surface.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. It will be seen from these remarks of Captain Eads on the protection of the alluvial lands—that was his subject—that he would make the levees useless. I stop there, and I say that Congress has no right to spend $4,000,000 out of the Public Treasury immediately without investigating a theory and a plan which proposes to render such an expenditure wholly unnecessary.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Does not Captain Eads recommend as a part of his plan that the crevasses should be closed?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Captain Eads has not made that recommendation in any form that has reached me; hence I am not prepared to answer that question.

I want to say that I was present at a hearing on this subject at Willard's Hotel when Captain Eads explained his project. When a question was asked whether levees formed any essential part of his plan he said they did not, and that he should disregard them. Subsequently I have been informed he said he would for the present, as a temporary expedient, close some of the crevasses, but I do not understand it is his theory to put $4,000,000 upon the top of these banks. And moreover, Mr. Chairman, while gentlemen upon this floor seem to differ about what is the plan of Captain Eads, I think this Congress should well pause to take some proper way to find it out and not leave it to the dictum of any gentleman here.

Mr. HOOKER rose.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi for a question.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether, if Captain Eads proposes to accomplish the result of allowing the citizens to reside upon the banks in quietude and peace, he proposes to do it by depening the channel, or by opening outlets for the river, or in what other way he proposes to accomplish it?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. In answer to the gentleman from Mississippi, I wish to say in brief, although it is not necessary for me to state it, that Captain Eads's theory is based on the same idea that is at the basis of the jetty system, that he would build his works within the banks of the river and set the river itself at work upon its bed scouring out its bottom. In opposition to that, it may be necessary to state that Army engineers, many of them, disagree with that theory. They say it is not sound—that it will not work the desired result, because it is claimed by them a large portion of the bed of the river is of hard blue clay and will not yield to the erosive action proposed; and therefore, when you confine the water, instead of scouring the bed, it will scour the sides down, together with the banks, levee, people, and all. That, we are told, is the difficulty about the matter. Then, upon this great question Captain Eads and the Army engineers are directly at variance, and I say it is well the subject should be investigated in the proper mode before we spend money on it.

I was about speaking of the outlet plan, and especially in reference to one of them, that of Colonel Cowden, to which the chairman of the committee has already referred. I wish to say, and I think it is due to Colonel Cowden to say a little more than the chairman has said, that we gave him the briefest hearing of any man who came before us; that we gave him the long time of about ten minutes. He has appeared before the Committee on Commerce recently, and submitted a memorial, which is now in print, and may be had by members. It is Miscellaneous Document No. 13. It gives the statement of his plan and views. He proposes, and so do others—for, on investigation of engineers' reports from time to time we find they say the outlet theory has been advocated by gentlemen of the highest ability, and not alone by Colonel Cowden—he proposes, as he illustrates it, to let the water out of the barrel through three holes instead of one, stating that three holes would carry off more water than one. Perhaps there are more than one now; but he would add three to whatever number there may be, and the three more would carry off more water.

Mr. ACKLEN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Let me make my statement first, and I will be happy then if I can answer the gentleman's question.

Colonel Cowden's plan is to relieve the Lower Mississippi of the surfeit of water, and that relieving the channel of the excess of water will, as he claims and as claimed by others who favor the idea, prevent overflow of the adjacent lands. He would open the river, for instance, into Lake Borgne, which connects with the Gulf of Mexico on the east, if I am not wrong in my geography, which would carry off a large portion of water in that direction. And it is well known that down the channel of the Red River comes an immense flood of water, contributing to the height of the Mississippi. He proposes, before that reaches New Orleans, to divert it and carry it into the Gulf of Mexico by the Calcasieu River. He proposes, also, that the Atchafalaya shall bear off from the Mississippi the waters of the Ouachita and other tributaries. That I understand, in brief, to be the outline of his plan, that if the water is kept away from the channel of the Lower Mississippi the people living along its banks will have less cause to fear, and those banks will be protected and ready for occupation and tillage. I will now hear the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ACKLEN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has made the statement that Mr. Cowden's idea was that he could let the water out of the barrel by three holes more readily and rapidly than he could by one. I ask the gentleman whether that would not depend altogether upon the size of the holes. In the first place, he proposes to let the water out of the Mississippi River by a large number of small outlets. By Captain Eads's plan it is proposed to force the water out of the Mississippi River by deepening and enlarging the capacity of the river both at its outlet and for several hundred miles up its course.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman that the size of the hole makes a great deal of difference. [Laughter.] I am going to leave it to the Congress of the United States hereafter to say what that shall be, and not let anybody in this House tell us what it shall be. I would not even let the gentleman from Louisiana decide that for me. [Laughter.]

Mr. ACKLEN. I should not oppose the commission by any means, but I should also strongly advocate the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I shall be glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Does this individual who proposes to take water out of the Mississippi propose to do it in the interest of the navigation of the Mississippi?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. In answer to the gentleman from New York, on the Upper Hudson——

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. On the Upper Mississippi.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Having an interest on the Upper Mississippi also, I will reply that I am not prepared to say what Colonel Cowden's plans in detail are. I am not here to advocate his plans. The Committee of the Whole will not of course so understand me. I infer, however, that his plan looks more to the protection of the lands than it does to the improvement of the navigation of the river. Then, there is, as a third proposition, this one of the levee system. Now, this question has been reported upon by various commissions of engineers, in part only at any one time. We find the commission constituted under the act of 1874, the president of which was General Warren, submitted to the Congress assembling thereafter a full report on the question. They made recommendations for an extensive survey of the whole locality. That commission was intrusted only with the duty of examining into and reporting upon the proper method of reclaiming and protecting the lands, not upon the improvement of the river.

This same question also has been under consideration of different committees of Congress from time to time; and I find in the report of the Senate committee in the Forty-second Congress—a report by Senator Alcorn—a paragraph that is very significant upon this proposition to repair the existing levees. After an investigation by that committee he submits the views of the committee, and I ask the Clerk to read the portion which I have marked. It will be seen that he says it would be wholly inadequate to repair the existing breaks and simply maintain the present levees.

The Clerk read as follows:

The estimates made by the Government engineers of the works on the Mississippi River consider "repairing existing breaks," "perfecting existing levees to the present height," and "perfecting existing levees to the proper height." "Repairing existing breaks" would, so far as the great aims which make the levees national, be a mere waste of public money. "Perfecting levees to the present height" would, in face of the scientific investigations which show that height to be totally insufficient, be a weak dalliance with a national duty. Your committee, therefore, have no hesitation in recommending that Congress go at the work of giving to the country the immense resources of the Mississippi alluviums in the spirit of intelligent earnestness which demands all that the Government engineers estimate under the head "perfecting existing levees to the proper height." To patch those works in any form short of this would be but to adjourn the question of their execution, after the loss of the immediate benefits which make the final disposition of that question an urgency of the hour, to be dealt with by and by in the more enlightened statesmanship which demands that it be dealt with thoroughly now.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. So much for the views of the Senate committee of the Forty-second Congress. And now, turning to the investigation made by the commission of 1874, at the head of which was General Warren, I find that commission declares that the present levee system is entirely defective and insufficient; that it is not sufficient for the demands of the locality. It will be borne in mind, in listening to the portion I shall ask to have read from that report, that the commission speak also of the reclamation of the lands. The lines should be drawn sharply between the plan for the protection of the lands in the future and plans for the reclamation or restoration of the country that has been injured by the previous floods. I ask the Clerk to read the portion I have marked from the report of the engineers' commission under the act of 1874.

The Clerk read as follows:

It being certain that the alluvial regions of the Mississippi can only be reclaimed by levees, it remains to consider what experience has taught respecting them. The existing system was begun a century and a half ago, near New Orleans, and has gradually extended upward until there are but few points on the river at which it has not been tried. The crops of cotton, sugar, corn, and rice heretofore gathered from the alluvial region, with all the existing wealth represented by lands under cultivation, cities, villages, plantations, and stock, are the direct fruits of this method of protecting the country against overflow. It cannot, therefore, properly be called a failure, and yet the actual condition of the region to-day is such as to demonstrate that the practical application of the system is fatally defective, and that unless some radical improvement be made, no hope remains of opening to cultivation the immense districts of back lands now exposed to annual inundation through annual breaks in the levees; and also that only precarious crops can be expected from the narrow fringe of plantations under cultivation now skirting the immediate borders of the Mississippi and its principal bayous and tributaries. To determine, therefore, in what respects the existing system is defective is highly important. The faults are only too apparent. They are:

First. Vicious levee organization.

Second. Insufficient heights, in adjusting which only existing high-water marks have been considered, without remembering that there has never yet been a great flood in the river in which the water has not been greatly lowered by immense crevasses which occur with absolute certainty.

Third. Injudicious cross-sections and construction, which alone would be sufficient to explain many of the frequent breaks, under the combined influence of pressure, seepage, burrowing of craw-fish, &c.

Fourth. Inadequate arrangements for inspecting and guarding.

Fifth. Faulty location of the embankments, which are often placed so near caving banks as to insure an early destruction.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. That commission suggested that the most proper plan would be a system of double levees. Now, I for one am not competent, and I presume many other gentlemen on this floor are not competent, to judge on that matter and not prepared to-day to vote on such information as we have. I hear gentlemen from that locality say that the recommendation of the commission is absurd, but I have not information enough to decide for myself for my own vote that the five gentlemen constituting that commission have put forward something that is absurd in science.

It was argued by a gentleman on the other side, I think the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] that the levees would constitute a means of enlarging and deepening the channel of the river and of scouring it out. Why, sir, it need only be suggested upon that point that if the bottom of the river is hard, as I said before, this scouring will be on the banks and against the banks of the river and to the damage and destruction of the levees, instead of upon the bottom.

But there are more serious questions than any of these I have touched upon, and because of these I feel this Congress will stop to consider before it puts out $4,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States in the repairs of levees. It has been said that the Government is committed to this work of repairing the levees. I take issue with that statement. The Government of the United States has ordered investigations from time to time and asked for plans and has given to the States grants of swamp and overflowed lands in order that they might repair their levees and keep out the enemy from their doors. But the Congress of the United States has not opened its Treasury to pay the labor that should build the levees along the banks of the river. This is the point where the new departure is sought; and I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we shall all pause and give it most careful reflection before we enter upon that great work.

Why, there are sovereign States in the Mississippi Valley. Many of them are jealous of their rights and perhaps would not wish to have their domain invaded by the national authorities for the construction of these national works. Will the United States go forward into the Mississippi Valley spending millions of dollars when it has no jurisdiction over the land it steps upon? Will it put men there to work upon a line where it has no right of way? Will it put its property into the embankments along the Mississippi in the various States and afterward be powerless to go upon that property and protect it? Consider it in that way. The State of Louisiana may be ever so vigilant; she may have the most perfect system of levees; the river may be carefully guarded so far as the levees of Louisiana are concerned; but the great old river is regardless of State lines, of the existence of Louisiana, and whenever there is a defective levee in Arkansas over it goes into Louisiana, spreading devastation in its course. That is true of all the States upon the river except those at the north. The United States, if it puts its money into this system of repairs, has no power to protect these levees; it has no power there to set its foot upon the territory of those States for that purpose. You may build the most perfect levees in any one of these States and there are enemies of the levees, both human and brute, who will destroy them at the first opportunity.

Why, sir, some jealous rascal, who is offended because a planter in his neighborhood is more prosperous than he, will dig a hole in the levee some night and let the water in and devastate the whole district, and in the same manner, but innocently, the musk-rat will do the same thing for his own diversion and pleasure. Why, sir, upon the great levees built in Egypt, upon the Nile, there is constant inspection and guard upon the whole line. It is watched and guarded and as much looked after and protected as are the great railway lines that belt this continent.

I do not believe that it is policy, I do not believe that it is safety for the United States Government to put its money into such a work beyond supervision or control. In the States there are local provisions imposing penalties for injuries to this class of property, but when these lines of levees become the United States property the United States has no jurisdiction through which it can make penalties or enforce them after it has provided them.

Mr. Chairman, I have said enough to give to the Committee of the Whole my views upon the whole subject. I am in support of the bill as reported by the committee, the first nine sections of the bill. This subject has been coming before Congress from time to time and it will continue to come until the people's representatives here have met it and passed upon it. The people of the Mississippi Valley, in the lower part of it, have a right to be heard upon this subject and to have their interests investigated and if possible acted upon if within the limits of the constitutional power of the Government and proper policy. I say that it is not the duty of the country to continually thrust this great question aside upon one pretext or another, but it is our duty to meet it squarely as a man would deal with such a question in his own affairs. He would sit down first and count the cost, and not begin to build a tower and have not the wherewithal to complete it. I say to the friends of this measure who believe that the whole system should be adopted that it is their duty to be patient and wait until the whole country sees that it is not only a proper but a necessary thing to do. I am not deterred by any considerations that when the great river is opened to commerce to an enlarged extent more freight will go down its bosom and be diverted perhaps from the great cities on the Atlantic shore. I am willing that the whole country shall be improved and opened for its best and most profitable occupation.

This territory whose interests are affected by this measure is greater than the whole of New England. I am not afraid that whatever improvements may be made there New England will be left out in the cold. Whatever conduces to the prosperity of the West or the South will benefit the East and the North. We are parts of one great whole, and if it is necessary under a proper policy to spend some money from the Treasury of the United States to meet the wants of those States lying along the Mississippi River, I hope it will not be begrudged to them, but it should not be done and the Government should not be committed until the plans have received a careful consideration and indorsement of the proper officers.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, as I said at the outset, I favored the bill as reported by the committee. I am opposed to the amendments which have been offered, and I say very frankly that if any of the amendments offered or suggested become a part of the bill, I shall be compelled to record my vote upon it in the negative.

Mr. SPARKS. I understood the gentleman to say that he was in favor of the first nine sections of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Of the first nine sections.

Mr. SPARKS. Is the gentleman in favor of this portion of the fourth section of the bill, namely, "and for the protection of the alluvial lands of the Mississippi Delta from overflow from said river?"

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. My impression is either that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] has not been present while I have been addressing the committee, or that I have been singularly deficient in making myself understood.

Mr. SPARKS. That provision is in section 4. Are you in favor of that?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I will answer the gentleman

This bill is intended to provide a commission to devise a plan for the improvement of the Mississippi River and the protection of the alluvial lands combined. If, as a part of the whole plan for the improvement of the river for purposes of navigation and incidental thereto, the lands of that valley may be protected—I am in favor of it. But if the result of the work of the commission should be only a report for the protection or reclamation of the lands alone, then as I now stand, as I am at present advised, I could not advocate or vote for such a proposition.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, all that I desire to say upon this subject, unless some gentleman wishes to ask me a further question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirteen minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I will reserve that time subject to my control in the future.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, it is my opinion that if this great Mississippi River found its original sources in the Rocky Mountains and then its outlet to the sea somewhere on the upper Atlantic coast, long since, had necessity required, it would have been walled in with marble and deepened, if need were, a thousand fathoms. If it rose somewhere in Russia and found its mouth down in the warm waters of the Mediterranean, ten millions of lives if not more would be sacrificed to control the river, and millions, nay hundreds of millions of dollars would be expended like water to make it perfectly subserve all the great and grand purposes intended by the bountiful Father in its creation.

One thing I would like to say right here, and I say it in no feeling or spirit of bitterness and with no intention even to engender or to originate a sectional thought. But I want the Representatives of this House, and particularly those from the northern section of the Union, to know one fact. While we of the South ask the mere pittance to improve the great river and protect the dwellers on its banks, in the coffers of the United States, in its Treasury, there are to-day $86,000,000 unconstitutionally and illegally collected upon the products of the very soil which is watered and enriched by this great river, and more than forty millions of that amount was collected in the States through which this river runs and whose lands and lives and homes we seek to protect by the passage of this bill.

There are $40,000,000 to-day in the Treasury of the United States unclaimed under the title of "captured and abandoned property" fund gathered from the wrecks of the alluvial States. Nobody claims it; it will never be paid back. Neither of these funds will ever be reimbursed. We do ask that you give us at least the interest of these great sums so that the lands from whose rich products they were wrung may be protected and rehabilitated.

This is no new subject; it has been a fruitful theme of debate very frequently in this Hall and in the other end of the Capitol for many years. When gentlemen tell us that we are not prepared to act, they very seriously criticise the action of a former House. In the Forty-Third Congress this House passed a levee bill appropriating, I think, some $3,600,000. That bill was beaten in the Senate by a single vote, and at a time, too, when the party to which the gentleman from Massachusetts belongs and which gave that vote had a two-third majority in this House and a very large majority in the other branch of Congress.

I propose to speak to-day, Mr. Chairman, not so much upon the bill reported from the committee or the amendments offered by my colleague [Mr. ROBERTSON] as upon the substitute which I have myself offered. I do not seek to dodge behind the commercial phase of this question. It is true that the commerce of the Mississippi River will be promoted and protected by levees. There is no question but that the deepening of the channel of the river, the washing out of its bars, and the removal of its snags will be promoted, will be accomplished by the building of levees; there is no doubt of that. But I also insist that it is the duty of this Government, its solemn and binding duty, to say that this great river which drains twenty-six States and Territories, and which performs that service in favor of the people who live in the higher latitudes, should be so guarded as to work no injury to the dwellers below. It is a national duty, binding in law and morals. Further along in my argument I will dwell briefly upon this feature of the measure.

In one phase this is the old question of internal improvements, practically the question which has so often occupied the time and attention of publicists, and which indeed has constituted one of the great questions upon which the political parties of the country have differed. But amidst all the conflicting theories upon this question I hold that there can be no doubt that where a work of internal improvement is either national in its character, national in its extent, or national in its influence, Congress may with perfect propriety lend its aid.

A work may be national in its extent, when it extends through several States and Territories, or it may be national from the influence which it is designed to exert. The jetties of Captain Eads which are confined to an extreme portion of the Union are national in their influence and national in their results. So, too, the Union Pacific Railroad, as well as the proposed Texas Pacific Railroad. These great measures are national by reason not only of the results which so flow and are to flow from them, but by reason also of the extent of the works themselves.

We are met by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] with two or three difficulties in the outset. In the first place, he intimates that we are divided among ourselves, that we do not know the character of the relief we want.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken in that. We do know that we want the levees, a system which from 1845, about the time it became general, up to 1861, was tried and found effective in protecting the lands and in keeping the navigation of the river open and unobstructed. We are told that one faction advocates a system of weirs and outlets as the proper mode of relief, and that we should pause until we ascertain which system it is best to adopt.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to appeal to the common sense of this House upon this proposed theory of outlets; I desire to appeal to the experience of every man who has traveled up and down the Mississippi River; I desire to appeal to the late reports of soundings by distinguished engineers, to show conclusively that wherever an outlet occurs, wherever a crevasse occurs and the water is diverted from its main channel, below that crevasse the river invariably fills up and bars are formed. Nature is always conservative in her action; she does not use more room than she requires; and it stands to reason that in sedimentary streams, where the dense sediment is suspended and carried along by the current, so soon as you check that current or decrease the volume and power of the flow which suspends and carries the sediment a deposit will occur in exact proportion with the check and decrease of power. Divert one-sixth of the water at any given point and it stands to reason that one-sixth less room is required below that point, and therefore conservative nature fills it up. In support of this theory I cite the remarkable case of the Tones Bayou, a little outlet which occurred in the Red River some twenty or twenty-five years ago, which in the beginning was only twenty or twenty-five feet wide, but which deepened and strengthened until it absolutely threatened to close up the navigation of Red River below, so that Congress was obliged to appropriate money to close the bayou. You gentlemen who voted for the last river and harbor bill appropriated $25,000 for that purpose, and $25,000 had been appropriated before, making in all $50,000 appropriated for the purpose of saving the navigation of the Red River by closing Tones Bayou. Since it has been closed by a dam and the whole power of the river current is confined to the channel the water has washed out the bars below and navigation is restored as completely as before. But in further support of the theory that crevasses or outlets form bars below their point of divergence I send to the Clerk's desk and will ask him to read the experiments and actual observations of Mr. Bailey, once a distinguished civil engineer, and now deceased; a gentleman who is remembered for eminence in his profession as well as for many civic virtues:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Bayley says: "On September 20, 21, (after the occurrence of the Bonnet Carre crevasse in April, 1874,) when the river was very nearly at its lowest stage, 20 feet below high water, I measured and carefully sounded two river sections above the crevasse outlet, one opposite and two below it; taking transit angles to each sounding. Sections 1 and 2 were taken 1 and 1¼ miles above the outlet, respectively; sections 4 and 5 were taken 750 and 1,500 feet below the outlet; sections 1 and 2 (taken above the crevasse) gave the following dimensions respectively: Widths, low water, 2,886 and 3,014 feet; maximum depths, 110 and 79 feet; mean depth, 64 and 54 feet; sectional areas, 184,653 and 164,167 square feet; high water width, 3,120 and 3,210 feet. Sections 4 and 5 (taken below the crevasse) gave the following dimensions respectively: Widths, low water, 2,406 feet and 2,452 feet; maximum depths, 62 and 64 feet; mean depth, 40 and 42 feet; sectional areas, 96,640 and 106,150 square feet; high water width, 3,300 and 3,430 feet. The average dimensions of the two upper and the two lower sections were as follows: Low-water widths, 2,950 and 2,429 feet; depths, 59 and 41.65 feet; sectional areas, 174,410 and 101,395 feet. Reduction of channel below average of upper and lower sections in width, at low water, 521 feet; in depth, average of whole sections or mean depth, 17.35 feet; in area of channel section, 73,015 feet—square feet. The mean high-water sectional area above was 232,003 square feet, and below, 156,913 square feet; reduction below 75,000 square feet.

"The bottom, or the river-bed, when the upper sections were taken, consisted of firm blue clay into which the 11-pound sounding-lead sunk from 1 to 2 inches only all the way across, while the depths were tolerably uniform, all indicating a channel of full natural dimensions free from deposits. The bottom, when both the lower sections were taken, was a soft, oozy mud or silt, into which the sounding-lead sunk from 1 to 2 feet, except near the left bank,' (where the current was strongest,) on the bend side of the river, where the bottom was also firm clay and free from deposits. Opposite the lower sections the sand-bar on the right-bank side had encroached upon the channel so much that the low-water width had been reduced more than 500 feet, and a new sandy ridge, evidently a deposit made during the preceding high water, from 12 to 15 feet high at its lower end, had been formed above the low-water line and over the old bar, in a direction parallel with the thread of the current, from the river above into the outlet opening. Very extensive new deposits of sand had been made in the right-bank bend next below, several feet high above low water and extending several hundred feet out from the shore-line; these were known to be new. Everything, the new sand-bars and sandy deposits, the new, oozy mud or silty deposits, extending nearly across the river channel below the outlet, and the very great reduction of channel-way below caused thereby, indicated most unmistakably that this Bonnet Carre crevasse outlet of 1874 did cause a partial filling-up of the river below." The experiments and observations of Mr. Bayley leave no room to doubt the fact that the crevasses of the Mississippi River swiftly and directly operate the formation of bars in the river below their point of outlet. He cites also the effect of outlets upon Red River, and especially the outlet known as Tones Bayou, some twenty miles below the city of Shreveport.

In twenty-five years this bayou, which, when cleared out, was an insignificant outlet, has increased its sectional area to 5,600 feet, while that of the main river below it has been reduced to 3,500 square feet; its depth has decreased 15 feet, and its channel has been contracted some 300 feet. An official report confirms Mr. Bayley's statements, and attributes the decrease in the area, width, and depth to the outlet above, "which has been," says the report, "constantly enlarging."

Mr. Bayley concludes that "the same law governs in all sedimentary rivers, whether small or great. The first effect of an outlet is to lower the flood-line of a river, because time is required to readjust the river's regimen; but the ultimate effect the reverse, because the law is that the less the quantity of water flowing the greater is the slope required for its discharge at a given velocity."

Mr. ELLIS. Upon this same point I quote from Professor Caleb G. Forshey, a very distinguished engineer, who has given perhaps twenty-five years of his life to the study of the Mississippi River and whose ripe scholarship and eminent attainments have justly awarded him a national reputation. Professor Forshey first announced this doctrine in 1850, and found himself combated by the entire Engineer Corps of the United States Army. In a late paper read before the Society of Civil Engineers this distinguished scientist and engineer says:

Outlets or water-weirs will form outlets almost immediately across the stream and directly below the weir or outlet. This is amply shown in the report upon the Bonnet Carré crevasse of 1850. Soundings showed the section below to be contracted 75,613 square feet as compared with a section at the upper end of the crevasse.

Now mark:

Soundings made during the high-water of 1851, the crevasse having been closed, prove that the great bar thrown across the river channel, by weakening its transporting forces in the discharge of water through the crevasse, was entirely carried away when the river was confined by the new levee. The difference was twenty-three thousand feet in the section.

Why, Mr. Chairman, this is the very theory on which Captain Eads is proceeding at the mouth of the Mississippi River. His jetties are mere levees—nothing else in the world than levees—and this scouring process, which we claim will be the result of rebuilding the levees, is absolutely vindicated by Captain Eads's experiments. He built levees in the South Pass; he confined the entire river in a narrow channel; he has caught up and concentrated the power of the river, and lo! it fights its own way to the deep sea, and makes for itself and for commerce a channel commensurate with the demands and necessities of both.

Now let gentlemen who advocate this outlet system beware. Let them reflect that if they inaugurate this mad system of diverting the waters of the river at given points bars will form below every point of diversion. The more the bars form the greater and deeper and wider will grow the outlets. The bars will increase, and new outlets will be demanded. It must go on in this way; and if the Government should attempt to carry out this insane theory the result will be that in forty or fifty years this magnificent river, this mighty inland sea, the first view of which thrilled the knightly soul of De Soto with dreams of splendid empire, will be utterly shoaled and barred, its strength filtered away through outlets and its usefulness utterly destroyed. The more outlets that are made, the more the bars will form. As the bars form and fill up the channel, the more will the outlets deepen and widen. Flood lines temporarily lowered by outlets will rise to their normal line and height just so soon as the river readjusts its regimen to its new requirements by deposits of sediment. Pursue this insane and exploded theory if you will, and you will utterly destroy the Mississippi River for commercial purposes.

Men of the West and men of the South, what say you to that dire possibility?

But we are told by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] that because Captain Eads has asserted his theory and announced his stupendous plan of straightening the river and thereby lowering the flood line, we are therefore not agreed as to a remedy, and we had better pause and ascertain the true plan to be pursued before spending money upon an uncertain experiment. Mr. Chairman, I tell my friend from Massachusetts that we have been pausing a little too long about this matter. Why, what is this theory of Captain Eads? Is it not the very doctrine underlying his theory that so soon as the river is straightened its scouring capacity will be increased, its force and power accelerated, augmented, and by the very action of its own current thus quickened in flow and augmented in power it will its own current thus quickened in flow and augmented in power it will deepen the channel until the channel shall be washed out, room for all its waters made, and the flood line of the river will be lowered to the level of the banks, and levees will be unnecessary. He wants $46,000,000 to do that. We ask a little above $4,000,000 to perform the same work by means of the old and well-tried system of levees. But in addition to the opinions and actual experiments of civil engineers we have the universal experience of the oldest and most experienced of our steamboatmen that so soon as the levee-system became general in 1845 and 1848 many bars were washed out, many dangerous snags and sawyers were removed, and there was a perceptible deepening of the entire channel of the river from Cape Girardeau to New Orleans. I hold, therefore, that in appropriating money to repair and rebuild the levees of the Mississippi River, the immediate effect of which will be to remove bars and deepen the channel of the river, Congress is moving directly in the interests of the commerce of the country. And for such purposes its constitutional power and authority are unquestioned.

But, again; how is the commerce of the river unfavorably affected by the crevasses and breaks in the levee? Mr. Chairman, those who have never seen a crevasse can form no adequate conception of its force, power, and destructiveness.

The force of a mighty outlet creates a powerful suck or counter-current from the center of the main stream; and this force exists in every crevasse, stronger or weaker as the outlet is greater or smaller. These maëlstroms draw with immense power and overwhelm whatever comes within their terrific grasp. The steamer, piloted with care and driven by ponderous machinery, and obedient as a child to the touch of the wheel, by hugging the opposite shore in the daytime, passes the point of danger in safety. But at night, and especially when the nights are dark or during the prevalence of the dense fogs that are so incident to that climate, the steamer is often obliged to land and tie up and await till the coming of day, or until the lifting of the fog, so as to pass the maëlstrom of the crevasse in safety. This operates a great deal of vexatious delay in the transportation of passengers, mails, and freight, and loss of time and money.

But steamers do not always escape. In the year 1875 one of the most costly and splendid steamers of the Lower Mississippi River—the Katie—freighted with four thousand bales of cotton and carrying hundreds of passengers, was drawn into the Bonnet Carre crevasse and came near proving a total wreck. Below New Orleans, at what is called the Jump, a large steamer—the St. Nicholas—some years ago was drawn into the crevasse and lost, and to-day her wreck may be seen from the river—a mournful proof of the dangers of the crevasse and a warning to those whose duty and whose province it is to guard and protect the commerce of the majestic river.

But while the steamer, guided by human intelligence and driven by machinery, may pass with comparative safety the suck of the crevasse, not so with vessels propelled with sail or oar or poles. And a busy and profitable trade has ever existed upon the Mississippi River by means of barges, flat-boats, rafts, and other kinds of trading-boats. Many of them do a mere local traffic, while others are freighted away up the Ohio and Missouri and Upper Mississippi, and floated down to the mart at New Orleans. Huge rafts of valuable timber also are gathered and floated upon the current of the river to a market. Even coal and grain barges in tow of a powerful tug and projecting their lengths a quarter of a mile in front of the tug are defenseless as the smaller water craft against the remorseless grasp and power of the crevasse. All are liable to be drawn into its jaws and totally wrecked. In the fall of 1874, when passing through the track of Bonnet Carre crevasse, I saw a flat-boat lying high and dry upon a pile of drift-wood fifteen feet in height. And during the flood season, which lasts from four to five months, commerce of this character is wholly and totally paralyzed. And it is no insignificant item, for thousands of men are engaged in it, and millions of money are invested in it. The statistics show in 1870 the arrival of some three hundred flat-boats at New Orleans, while in 1860 the arrivals were eight hundred and seventy-nine. This falling off, which has increased in the past six years, tell the sad story of the decline of the commerce of the river in this line of water craft. And here, Mr. Chairman, I desire to impress upon the members from the great West, from Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and other great States of that region, that this class of commerce was and is peculiarly theirs.

And another impressive fact for their consideration is that the opening of the mouth of the river through the enterprise of Captain Eads and the aid of the Government will make the Mississippi River their great highway to the sea, and that their vast crops of grain in bulk will be transported in barges down the river, and that there are now unclosed and unchecked more than thirty dangerous crevasses which if unclosed must during four or five months of the year operate the most serious danger and hinderance to that particular kind of water craft. The same may be said of the coal-barges which are laden with the toil of the hardy miners of Pennsylvania and West Virginia at Pittsburgh and Wheeling to float down fifteen hundred miles to the levee at New Orleans. Thus, Mr. Chairman, do the interests of East and West demand alike that the navigation of that great national highway be made safe and its commerce free from peril and accident.

Though the dwellers in those regions are safe from the ravages of floods and have not listened with anxiously beating hearts to hear the swollen and angry river dash its mad waves against the frail levee in front; though they and their wives and children may never hear with wild alarm the terrific and triumphant roar of the river's voice when it has burst through the barriers that bound it and sweeps around and against their homes in its desolating career, yet their vital interests call for these measures of relief, which will make the dwellers by the river's side as safe as they in their upland homes.

I ask you, men of the West, if you will see the usefulness of the river and the mission it was sent to perform for you utterly destroyed by the failure of the Government to appropriate money in its behalf? Talk to me about the fear of subsidies! I tell you men of enlightened opinion, you men of information, it is your duty to lead your people to the light in regard to these measures, and not permit them to stand between you and the light. I say the man of the West who cannot go before his people and successfully defend his course in voting to deepen the channel of our great river and make its commerce safe is not worthy to represent that people on this floor.

But, sir, there are yet other commercial considerations to be advanced in support of this great measure. The Mississippi River, from Cape Girardeau to within fifty miles of its mouth, runs upon a ridge. Its natural banks in the lowlands are about seven feet above the lands one mile from the river's margin; or, in other words, in a straight line at right angles with the river the land deflects seven feet in one mile. The levees upon the banks vary in height from seven to twenty-two feet. In the flood season of each year the waters rise nearly to the top of the levees, so that the flood-line of the river is from fourteen to twenty-nine feet above the homes and fields of the dwellers in the plains below.

It is a well-known fact that when a levee is once washed over or broken through it is almost impossible to save it and prevent a crevasse. A steamer of large size will hurl a succession of waves fifteen or twenty in number, and varying in height from eighteen to twenty-one inches, from her side-wheels against the levees.

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask that he read from this report the portions I have marked. They are the calculations and results of the observations of a distinguished civil engineer from whom I have already had occasion to quote.

The Clerk read as follows:

The claim of the inhabitants of the Delta for national aid rests upon much stronger grounds than mere prospective revenues and productions. These claims come in the form of reclamation. They are based upon the perpetual and ever-increasing attack upon the levees by the passing commerce of twenty-six States and Territories of the Union. * * * The steamers that transport this commerce send their waves ceaselessly against banks and levees, lashing and abrading them with tremendous power. The Lower Mississippi rarely rests. One series of waves succeeds another, and each wave finds its rest in the equivalent of its force transferred to the banks and channel of the river. These lashings and abradings, independent of other causes, render the task of levee construction more and more oppressive yearly, until they have become intolerable. That this burden should be borne in part by those whose commerce attacks and batters down the levees, appears most equitable.

* * * * * * *

The forces started by a steamer in motion are chiefly lateral. The bow of the vessel and the paddle-wheels throw up waves that find movement only upon the river's surface, and even when the paddle strikes downward the displacement of the water is lateral, except at a short distance below the dip of the wheel. The force operates downward only at the wheels or propeller, and the reaction causes waves which race along the surface in successive lines, and break against the levees. And since the waters are indefinitely mobile among their particles, repose for the results of force can alone be found against the walls of the channel. The total force exerted against the bank must be the same whether diffused or concentrated, though the abrasions may be totally different. * * * The banks of the river being composed of material brought and deposited by a current flowing at the rate of three feet per second, it is but reasonable that when new forces are brought to bear upon them by greater velocity of current or wave these particles are displaced and carried on down the current.

Let us take an example: the steamer James Howard, side wheels, with 1,500 tons freight, passed up the river at near mean high-water gauge at Carrollton, 12.5 feet, 3 feet below maximum. Her rate of speed was ten miles per hour against a current of four miles per hour, making the movement of her waves equal to fourteen miles per hour. The waves of practical value were oblique 23° to her course on each side, and could be distinctly counted to the fifteenth wave, and I added five for the confused and irregular waves that followed. Ten of these waves were nearly of the same height, and were measured by their rise on a rod and a drift-log that did not break them. These waves averaged about 16 inches height at 300 feet behind the steamer, and the remaining ten waves averaged less than half that height, say 6 inches. They were all delivered against the banks with the velocity of the steamer plus the rate of the current, say fourteen miles per hour, or 20 feet per second. Without attempting to weigh this force by computing its dynamics from these data, we assume the tonnage of the steamer multiplied by her velocity gives the just practical result. The tonnage of freight and vessel was about 2,300 tons. We have, then, 4,600,000 pounds multiplied by 14.6 seconds multiplied by 17.60 for each mile of her travel. The aggregate force, then, that is abnormal, applied by this steamer, amounts in foot-pounds to 118,201,600 pounds, equal to 59,000 tons.

Let us illustrate: a levee of 9 feet in height, by the recent formula of Humphreys and Abbott, with slopes of two and three to one, contains 1,200 cubic yards in every 100 feet of levee, and 3,000 pounds to the cubic yard. The 300 feet of levee, equal to the length of the steamer James Howard, would weigh 10,800,000 pounds. The force thrown against the levee or bank each trip by the passing steamer would be—more than three times the weight of the whole levee.

$$\frac{68,160,000}{2} = \text{to } 34,080,000;$$

Owing to the tenacity of the soil and materials of the banks of the river, these banks do stand these forces repeated fifty times a day under many modified forms. The fact that they do stand this fearful servitude is almost miraculous. But it is wholly abnormal and chargeable to the commerce of the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Representatives of the entire Mississippi Valley and every one interested in the commerce of the river to the facts just read. Before I close I will notice more at length this "wear and tear upon the levees," a servitude imposed by the commerce of the river. What I desire now to notice is the constant danger that the lateral waves of the passing steamers are liable at any time in flood season to wash over and dissolve the levees. For fear of this calamity descending steamers are often obliged to shut off steam and float past the threatened points or weak places in the levee, while the ascending steamer must depart from her course to hug the opposite shore, or slacken her speed to three or four miles per hour. Again, the steamers are afraid to land at or near the weak points of the levee lest their waves or weight against the frail embankment cause a crevasse, to the ruin of those who dwell below. Consequently they are often obliged to carry passengers, mails, and freight many miles away from and beyond their destination to the great detriment and delay of commerce and travel. To these considerations I might add the tremendous loss and damage to the commerce of the Delta over the railroad lines which pass through it.

Within the last fifteen years the bed of the New Orleans, Saint Louis and Chicago Railroad, the only line of egress or ingress north of New Orleans, has been washed away three times by crevasses from the river, inflicting upon it a loss of millions of dollars, and paralyzing its operations for months. The New Orleans and Texas Road which connects New Orleans with a line of Texas and Mexican steamers shared a like fate. The Monroe and Vicksburgh Road, which from a point opposite Vicksburgh runs to Monroe, and is designed to pass through Shreveport into the heart of Texas, is useless and worse than useless four months in the year. Its line passes through a region of marvelous fertility, the chosen land of cotton. Yet, during the flood seasons its trains are stopped because a sea of water, forty miles in width, covers and whelms its track and the adjacent lands. Not many months ago I passed over that road. It crosses the bayou Macon some forty miles from Monroe. The bank of that bayou in former days was a solid field, and the little depot on the road shipped annually two hundred thousand bales of cotton. The depot is gone; the deserted fields are already grown up in a wilderness of cottonwood trees; the devouring flood left not one vestige of fence or houses in their resistless sweep, and the smile of the fertile field is changed to the dark frown of the wilderness.

One single other cry of the suffering and endangered commerce of that river do I desire to voice, and then I will have done with this branch of the subject.

New Orleans, the city which I in part represent here, has suffered untold ills in the seventeen fearful years since 1861. That year saw her proud and rich and smiling, so like a queen amid her groves and palaces that winter never touched too rudely and that care never overshadowed. From her throne by the flow of her majestic river, she looked abroad upon fields of marvelous fertility covered with their billowy green of sugar cane, with their noble mansions, the abode of the most splendid refinement and prodigal hospitality. Far up and down the broad river she watched to see the flitting steamers come and go under the mighty impetus of her grand commerce, while afar upon lake and gulf came and went the stately ships, bearing her rich gifts to foreign shores, and coming to quietly furl their sails by her levee, to pay their tribute and tender their offerings to her. This era of splendid prosperity was followed by war, a paralysis of her commerce, and utter prostration of her business. The loss to New Orleans by the war was most enormous. But in 1865, without a murmur, she gathered up her strength and set forward to work out her destiny. The levees of Louisiana were down; many of the finest plantations were in ruins; the labor-system wholly destroyed; without capital or credit, and with a debt of some $8,000,000. During the years 1865, 1866, and 1867, the State was under military rule except for a brief period.

These years of misrule cost the State untold millions of money and plunged her into a hopeless sea of debt. Our city debt from $4,000,000 grew to be $23,000,000. So enfeebled and ruined was the condition of the State and city that it seemed impossible that they could grapple with the levee system. Yet the State since the war has issued $11,000,000 of bonds for levee purposes, enough, if honestly administered, to have built up the levees and closed every crevasse from New Orleans to Cape Girardeau. But alas, the fund was maladministered and squandered uselessly. Just north of New Orleans is Lake Ponchartrain, once a most beautiful expanse of clear water, forty miles long by an average width of twenty-two miles. Through the Rigolets on the southeast it connects with the Mississippi Sound and Lake Borgne. Across this lake some three hundred vessels of all kinds were plying, and the commerce carried on upon its waters engaged three thousand men and maintained twenty thousand people. The traffic with the upland regions was of lumber, bricks, wood, cattle, moss, sand, shells, fruits, cotton, and other products of the soil. In the lake itself a large traffic in fish and oysters was carried on. On the northern shores of the lake and for near one hundred and thirty miles along the Mississippi Sound a number of beautiful little towns have sprung up, adorned with handsome villas and splendid residences. These were the summer resorts of the people of Mobile and New Orleans. There resorted the merchants and business men of these cities with their families for relief from the five months of summer of that climate.

The healthfulness of the locality, the fine bathing and fishing afforded, constituted the chief delights of the summer homes. But in 1874, in April, forty miles above New Orleans and four miles west of the western border of Lake Pontchartrain, when the river was at flood height, the powerful levee of Bonnet Carre Point gave way. The river wave through the crevasse burst with awful force upon the plains below; it reached and swept away houses, sugar-mills, fences; reached and tore up the line of the New Orleans, Saint Louis and Chicago Railroad a distance of twenty-two miles, and then headed itself into Lake Pontchartrain. It has washed a gulf where it leaves the river over fifty feet deep and is now nearly half a mile wide. In flood seasons it is computed that one-sixth of the river water passes through it into the lake. That crevasse is still open. Each year it is widening and deepening. It is forming a serious bar in the main channel just below it. The bar, under the law of the river I have cited, will increase as the outlet increases. The whole character of Lake Pontchartrain is changed. Its once clear and salt waters have become fresh and muddy as the river. The sediment from the river is being deposited in the lake and has shoaled it already in five years along a distance twenty-two miles long by five miles wide a depth of from two and a half to eight feet. Captain T. S. Hardee, an engineer of much distinction and late city surveyor of New Orleans, who has recently completed a hydrographic survey of the lake and has carefully observed the effects of the crevasse upon it, in his able and comprehensive report, says:

The effects of the crevasse up to the present time has been to raise the ordinary level of Lake Pontchartrain, which abnormal condition lasts generally about four months in the year, or during the flood period of the Mississippi River. The elevation of the service of the lake is almost exclusively due to the immense volume of foreign water constantly precipitated into its bosom from the crevasse, which must necessarily create for itself a new plane of discharge to the Gulf by the consequent forced rising of the water.

Colonel Hardee estimates that during the flood season, when the waters of the lake are raised from this abnormal condition, the prevalence for some days of a southeasterly storm, checking and driving back the flood-water which seeks egress to the sea through the Rigolets, would subject the city of New Orleans to the severest overflow she has ever experienced, and would flood that city from the river to the lake. The damage from such a result it is almost impossible to estimate.

Under the influence of the Bonnet Carre crevasse, Lake Pontchartrain is undergoing a complete metamorphosis. The oysters and fish, which contributed largely to the commerce of the city and supplied it with these articles, have been killed or driven from Lake Pontchartrain, while the same result is perceptible along the entire Mississippi coast as far as East Pascagoula, more than a hundred miles from the city of New Orleans. The beauty and healthfulness of the summer resorts along these shores have been sadly changed, and property has depreciated immensely in value. The intermingling of the mud-laden waters of the Mississippi with the salt water of the sea, changing the character of the lake entirely, has been the fruitful cause of many types of disease that has destroyed the healthfulness of the upland regions. Sir, I do believe that to this cause may be traced the inducement of those peculiar conditions and that atmospheric state that, if it did not originate, at least created a congenial and favorable condition for the growth and spread of that dark angel of pestilence which spread its somber wings above so large a portion of the South during the past autumn and summer, and breathed death into the faces of those who dwell in that unfortunate portion of our common country, and filled all that bright land with desolation and mourning and woe.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the enlightened judgment of the representatives of the American people if in the simple recital of these facts there is not enough cause for the relief asked for in this bill. Misruled and bankrupt, with prostrate commerce and ruined industries, so sadly changed that they are scarcely now to be recognized as the same proud rich State and city that they seemed in 1861, unable to help themselves, they appeal to the justice and sympathy of this great Government for aid, that final and utter ruin may be averted.

Having briefly pointed out the reasons which go to the commercial character of this bill, and stamp it as clearly constitutional under the powers of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, I propose briefly to allude to the national character of the work proposed to be accomplished through this measure. It is national—eminently national:

First. Because it is for the benefit of the commerce of the greatest of all the rivers of the Union, emphatically a national river.

Second. It is national because the work extends through the river fronts of six great States of the Union.

Third. It is national because destined to benefit the entire people of the Union.

Fourth. It is national because a levee system to be successful must be uniform. No single State can perfect a system that will be perfect and successful. Upon this point I cannot do better than to quote from a report of a former committee, which was unanimously adopted. I read from page 3, Report 494, Forty-fourth Congress, first session:

> General Humphreys, Chief of Engineers, was kind enough to come before your committee, and he was especially asked for an opinion upon this point. With map before him he pointed out the localities of the levees in the States, beginning with those of Louisiana and Mississippi and tracing them to those of Illinois and Missouri, showing the weak points and natural outlets of the levees and the river, and demonstrated that the system to be successful must be uniform in all the exposed States. Of what avail would Louisiana build levees with none constructed in Arkansas? The outlets in the latter State, in flood-time pouring their immense volumes of water down upon the former State, would deluge all her territory in rear of her levees and render them, however effective and well constructed, but a narrow thread of island in the midst of an inland sea. Professor C. G. Forshey, a distinguished engineer and scientist, who has made the currents and levees of the Mississippi a study for more than thirty years, agrees perfectly with General Humphreys in this view. He says: "No State alone can build its levees, because of the interdependence of its topography. A system to be efficient in one must comprehend them all. The interior is a basin or series of basins. The water, wherever let in, submerges the basin alike. These States, then, must share a common fortune, and hence it must appeal to a power that comprehends many States in its operations. Congress alone has that power."

Then the work proposed by this measure is national in its every aspect, and as such it ought of right to be undertaken and performed by the National Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, I hold as a legal proposition that the Government should assume the labor and the responsibility of leveeing the Mississippi River. Apart from every commercial, economical, and charitable consideration, I hold that the Government is legally and morally bound to do this work. The Mississippi River is the great intercontinental drain or sewer of the Union. It is the drain for twenty-four States and Territories of the Union. To bring the thought nearer to this body, let me say that it drains the homes and fields of the constituents of forty Senators and one hundred and fifty Representatives in Congress.

In this it performs a most valuable, useful, and necessary function for two-thirds of the States in the Union; and, if this be true, is it not the duty, nay, more, does there not rest upon the Union the legal and moral obligation to so control the functions of this sewer that it shall not be a benefit and a blessing to certain States and people of the Union and to other States and people of the same Union a blight and a curse?

Let us see if this proposition be sound. We will suppose that the people of the overflowed regions were able, by dike or canal, to divert the surplus waters of the river from their own lands and States, and force them by unnatural ways upon the people of some other States and regions; and suppose they should attempt to do so—would not the courts and laws of the Union be invoked, and would not decrees of injunction issue restraining such an attempt; and would not the decision be that a natural servitude was imposed upon the streams and lands below in favor of the lands and dwellers above? Unquestionably it would be so decided. Such are the rules of law. But a principle of the same law is that whenever a political corporation imposes or enforces or enjoins a servitude upon one portion of its domain for the benefit of other portions, it shall be so regulated as not to injure the portion which bears the burden of the servitude.

But, Mr. Chairman, I must pass on rapidly and as briefly as possible to regard this measure in the light of its economy and necessity. The region subject to overflow is some 600 miles long and has an average width of 60 miles. Its area is 38,000 square miles. It is larger than the six New England States, leaving out Maine. It is five times as large as New Jersey or Massachusetts; it is four times as large as Maryland. And I undertake to assert that it is naturally the richest region of like extent upon the face of the earth. It can sustain a population of 60,000,000 more easily than New England sustains 3,500,000. Its soil is exhaustless. When cleared of its forest growth it is ready for the plow. There are no stones or gravel or pebbles intermingled with its soil. It is alluvial deposit, and does not wear out.

Its crops of sugar, rice, and cotton are of the richest kind. In all productions of forest and field and orchard it is unrivaled. Noble streams, deep and broad, drain this region in all directions, and its level lands, its splendid timber, invite the laying of road-beds without cuts and tunnels and curves, and almost without grading. Before the mad strife of 1861 began the States and people, chiefly by their own means, had leveed this region, and where protected, even sparsely settled as it was, how rich and splendid were its productions!

In 1860 it produced 469,000,000 pounds of sugar, and yet the fronts of streams and bayous alone were cultivated. The mere crust of the sugar region was cultivated, while the main body of the lands adapted to sugar growth were all untouched. That crop of sugar and molasses alone added $40,000,000 to the produced values of the country, and by supplying one-third of the demand for home consumption saved the country, including the duty on sugar, about $53,000,000.

There are 2,000,000 undeveloped acres of those sugar lands. If you will protect them they will be brought in cultivation within the next fifteen years. The sugar crop was in the past year the best that has been produced since the war, and reached about 180,000,000 pounds, or 280,000,000 less than in 1860, a loss of $26,000,000 as compared with the crop of 1860, and all occasioned by lack of protection against the floods of the river.

And now suppose in ten years from now you reclaim by protection half the sugar area and bring it into cultivation, say 1,000,000 acres. It will average one and a half hogsheads or 1,500 pounds to the acre, and the total yield will be 1,500,000,000 pounds. We now import 1,515,091,627 pounds, for which we pay in price and duty $121,207,429.62 in gold, besides $12,000,000 in commercial commodities. Let us estimate that in ten years our consumption of sugar will have increased to 2,000,000,000 pounds from about 17,000,000,000 pounds that we now consume. Then will there be a necessity only for the importation of 500,000,000 pounds, for which in price and duty at present rates we will pay $47,500,000 against the $121,207,429.62 which we now pay, or in other words we will then save annually $73,707,429.62 in this single item of sugar alone.

And, Mr. Chairman, it is well to look at this sugar problem. That article has entered into the life of our people. It is no longer a luxury, but a necessity, as much so as salt. The doom of African slavery is near at hand. Cuba and the Spaniard have agreed that the slave shall be free.

And then, sir, in my judgment, will the history of sugar production in Jamaica, Porto Rico, and Hayti be repeated in Cuba, and in a few years she will cease to export that product. The causes which will bring this result are apparent and natural. In those tropical islands sugar can only be successfully raised by forced African labor. It has been attempted. England has experimented with African free labor in Jamaica, and she then tried the Mongolian, the cooly, and she failed. That island and Hayti and Porto Rico ceased to export sugar when slave labor was abolished. The causes which operated this result in those islands exist in Cuba. The African laborer there is a mere human machine; has never been held close to the strong and intense blaze of Anglo-American civilization, and is so far behind the African laborer in the United States as scarcely to be recognized as belonging to the same race of beings. The Cuban slave is a mere barbarian, but recently from his tribe and his native shores; he is treated as an animal and driven as one. The history of that race and its present condition prove that its individuals will not work where they can be idle. In Cuba he can be idle; nature there tempts him to be idle; she holds out to him her arms laden with rich and magnificent fruits that never fail; she points to her rivers and sea-coasts with unfailing yield of food from the waters, and her climate is so mild that it invites the barbarian to wear simply nature's garb.

These causes are climatic and natural. We cannot alter them. Let me disclaim here all intention of reflecting upon the African race or of wounding the sensibilities of those of that race who are American citizens. For them I have only feelings of kindness and respect. I recognize among them men of great ability and virtue. Representing a district in which half the people are colored, I number among them many warm personal and political friends. Their interests are dear to me; for their happiness, their moral, social, and intellectual elevation I feel the deepest solicitude, and while I remain a public servant I shall neither know nor seek to know any difference between their interests and those of the people of my own race.

But I simply state what is well known when I say that the barbarian who now tills the sugar lands of Cuba will not work unless forced to do so either by his fellow-man or by the rigorous demand of nature. Nature is kind in Cuba; she invites to idleness; she has established there the home and the paradise of the "lotus eaters." Then take away the power of the owner, the coercive system, and the laborer, free to go where he pleases, will accept cordially nature's invitation to be idle, and the labor system of Cuba is destroyed. From Cuba we import 1,500,000,000 pounds of the 1,700,000,000 pounds of sugar we consume annually. If that supply fails then where shall we turn and to what source shall we look for our supply? Fully developed, Louisiana can and will supply it. If her lands were reclaimed and in culture and her capacity fully tested she can produce with her two millions of acres 2,500,000 hogsheads of sugar or 2,500,000,000 pounds, or 800,000,000 pounds more than we now need. We would then save annually in price and duty $121,207,429.62 in gold, and leave us a surplus of 800,000,000 pounds for export, which at present prices would be worth $56,000,000, or a total annual profit to the United States of $177,207,429.62.

But, sir, another great interest now demands attention. I refer to our great staple, cotton. This overflowed region in 1861 produced 2,300,000 bales of cotton, worth $138,000,000. Now it produces but about 1,000,000 bales, worth but $60,000,000. The loss in this staple alone is therefore $68,000,000. But developed it will produce 10,000,000 bales of cotton, worth $600,000,000 at present prices. It is true that the production of this enormous quantity of the raw material would of necessity cheapen it, but it would also transfer the cotton manufactures of the world to the United States. Our manufacturers could, with the raw material at hand, save all the expense in cotton manufacture between the gin and the sale-counter, and this now includes the pressing, weighing, marking, hauling, freight by rail or river, insurance, commissions for sale, reweighing, repressing, and loss in weights and samples; or, in other words, a saving of 30 per cent. in favor of our home manufactures. Mr. Chairman, without pausing further for details I would add that the great production and advantage to our manufacturers would give to this Union the cotton trade of the world. England has long enjoyed a monopoly of it, and even now she is straining every nerve to make herself independent of us and of our production. At a cost of $400,000,000 she has projected a railroad system in India. Her intention is to tap the coal regions of China and connect them with the cotton fields of India. She squanders her treasure like water to do this. Contemplating the swift advent of that period when her cotton trade and manufactures must suffer defeat and fall back from Manchester, she plans to remove Manchester to India, or, in other words, to her cotton-field.

Splendid nation! Magnificent people! Penny-foolish but pound-wise, she plants her gold where it will produce and return sixty and one hundred fold. She halts not at climatic difficulties; she fights the very decrees and laws of nature. She showers her treasure in the jungle that her commercial supremacy may still be maintained. It is in our power to wrest from her the control of the cotton trade and manufacture of the world and to wield its scepter forever. Shall we not extend our hands and grasp this prize? And then, even as our starry flag in war swept the ocean wave the harbinger of victory, so shall our more peaceful pennant of commerce float high above those of the other nations. And for this triumph you must look, you are obliged to look, to the overflowed lands of the Mississippi River. The cotton belt is narrow. The upland cotton regions are now taxed to their greatest capacity. It is this development of the uplands since the war that has kept our cotton crop up to the mark of 1861. To increase it you must reclaim the alluvial fields; you must reopen the abandoned plantations.

But, Mr. Chairman, look again at the losses to the general wealth for lack of levees. Originally these lands unreclaimed were worth but $8,520,000. When reclaimed they were worth, in 1861, $366,100,000. The value of the appreciation was $357,580,000. In sixteen years, without levees and protection, these same lands are worth $100,000,000. The loss through depreciation is $257,580,000.

But, sir, I would have you glance with me at another item of loss which is more tangible and more easily appreciable. Since 1861 there have been four great floods.

In 1862 the loss was estimated, in stock, houses, fences, and crops, at	$9,000,000
In 1865, from same causes, loss was	6,000,000
In 1867 it was but about	4,000,000
And in 1874 it reached the great sum of	13,000,000
Or a total material loss in fifteen years of	32,000,000

Or at the rate of more than $2,000,000 each year.

In the flood seasons the suffering of the people in the overflowed regions is very great. Especially is this the case with the colored laborers. They are poor, they have no credit, they cannot move from their homes as most of the whites can do. Freed by the policy of the Government, the Government should in honor and duty protect their material interest from ruin. Ah! had the Government shown as eager desire to protect their little homes and crops and stock as it has to protect them in "rights" which can not feed or clothe them, it would have been far better for the Government, for them, and for us. In 1874 the suffering was immense. Thousands of persons were huddled in their homes for months and saw no dry land. In the day-time it was from door or window to watch the restless waters rise, to see fences and outhouses floated away, to travel about in boats to gather what they could of moss and evergreen to feed stock placed in gins and upon platforms above the reach of the flood; and at night it was to sleep with the sob and murmur of the hungry waters in their ear, or to be awakened by the cry and struggle of drowning stock. From our poverty we gave what we could. And then the generous people of the Union heard the cry of suffering. Boston and Massachusetts asked no questions, but sent us aid. That generous city sent us a quarter of a million of dollars, and other cities of the State added to the sum until it reached $400,000. And New York and Philadelphia, Chicago and Saint Louis, Cincinnati and Baltimore, heard and responded. The President with great promptness and humanity ordered immediate distribution of rations and clothing.

In recalling now that splendid charity toward my suffering people equaled only by that noble outburst of humanity which came to them last autumn and which was the only ray of heavenly light amid the awful gloom of the pestilence, and in saying that our hearts beat warmly with gratitude, I do speak the feelings and utter the hearts of our whole people; and I voice their feelings and utter their hearts also when I beg of the Representatives of that noble and generous people who aided us in the hour of our danger and sorrow that they give to us now such aid as will enable us to rebuild our waste places, recover our lost fields, and re-establish our ruined homes; and then will we no more be obliged to eat the bread of charity—bitter, even though so generously tendered by a brother's hand.

Mr. Chairman, in providing in the substitute I have offered for the rebuilding of the levees I have followed the counsel of all the engineers. The engineers of the United States have recommended it time and again; and so do Forshey, Eads, Bayley, Warfield, and every other engineer that has spoken. The various plans of reclamation by outlets, diversion of tributaries, reservoirs, have all been discussed and condemned as unwise and impracticable. The amounts named in the bill are the estimates of the United States engineers of 1874, to which have been added the estimates for a number of crevasses that have occurred since the estimates of the Government engineers were made. In proposing to place the work under the control of the Engineer Corps of the Army my design was to confide it to hands that would do it faithfully and intelligently; hands that are strong and clean and free from jobs and contractors' bribes.

Mr. Chairman, I have concluded the simple story of this measure, and of its necessity. You do not know how eagerly and how intently the people of that grand but unfortunate region are watching you and how joyfully their hearts will throb; how hope will revive and confidence be restored when they hear that you have passed this measure. False partisans have told them you cared nothing for the South or her interests; that the two great political parties cared but for her political alliance and strength as an element of their own strength. Now you will show that these representations are false. Uniting upon this great measure, the two great parties will give earnest token that they eagerly long for the rehabilitation of the South and a restoration of her prosperity. But this measure is not alone for us. It is also for you of the West and the North and the East. I say to you that there is no industry, there is no pursuit, there is no interest within all your bordors from east to west that will not feel the impetus of new life with these plantations of the South reopened again and all of their ancient industries and productions revived and increased.

Since 1861, agriculture in this country has taken a mighty stride forward. Machinery has been applied to almost every branch of agriculture, which is the true source and basis of national wealth. Yet your ships are idle, your miners are in want, your coal scarcely finds a southern market, your machinery is no longer needed, your farming utensils are no longer in demand. We no longer need your corn or bacon from the mighty West, because we have been obliged to circumscribe our product of the great staples and to learn to cultivate and rear the bare necessities of life at home, and all because we have no money to buy what you produce, for we cannot cultivate our flooded fields.

Open up the plantations of the South and they will extend their hands for your sugar-mills and your cotton-gins, and all your labor-saving implements. Ay, and they will have the money with which to pay for them. They will extend their hands for your mules and horses and your improved stock of every description, and they will be able to pay for them. Realizing greater profit in the culture of the staples, they will gladly be dependent upon the great West for the cereals which are annually burned for fuel in that great country, or which seeks through forced and unnatural channels a profitless market; and for your wheat and corn they will give you gold. Their machinery will hunger for the productions of your mines, and your coal-barges away from Pittsburgh and Wheeling down the Ohio will find welcome and customers and money at ten thousand plantations along the Mississippi River, and along all the mighty streams and bayous which vein the now overflowed region. Yes, and we will freight your ships with wealth more splendid than that of "Ophir and of Ind," and sending them forth they shall return to you anon laden with treasure more countless than that of the Tyres and Sidons of the olden story.

Mr. Chairman, these are the aspirations of the South; these are her ambitions. War-worn and weary, with every dream of separate empire vanished, she longs now only for the nobler triumphs of peace and civilization. In her desolation she asks your aid. Give it her, and she will repay you sixty and a hundred fold. In the march of years you men of other sections will understand her better, and she will keep perfect step with you in that giant stride which will time the measure of her march toward the highest pinnacle of national power and glory.

Mr. HATCHER. I yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. REAGAN. I have but a few remarks to make and as this matter will probably not come up to-morrow, I think I had better say what I have to say now.

Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to participate in this debate, indeed I did not know until this morning that this question was to come up to-day, but I only propose to say a few words in relation to it, because the general subject has on many occasions during the last three years been before the Committee on Commerce, of which I am a member.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will not the gentleman yield for a motion that the committee rise? There are to be memorial services to-night to the late Professor Henry.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall not occupy more than ten minutes and I prefer to go on.

No questions more affecting the interests of the country could come before the House than those raised by the bill reported by the committee and the various amendments thereto.

The constitutional authority of Congress to act upon this question so far as it relates to the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries is beyond doubt, and is conferred by that clause of the Constitution giving Congress authority to regulate commerce between the States.

Mr. ITTNER. There is too much confusion in the Hall. We cannot hear the gentleman. He has said that he desires to speak but a few minutes, and I hope that order will be restored and maintained so that he can be heard.

Mr. ROBERTSON. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will yield, I will move that the committee now rise.

Mr. REAGAN. As members seem to be somewhat restless, I will yield for the committee to rise.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the committee now rise. I desire to say that I will ask the House for leave to proceed with the further consideration of this bill on Tuesday evening next.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Make it Wednesday evening.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Very well; I will say Wednesday evening; and that if the previous question shall be called at the close of the session that evening and sustained, the vote on the bill shall be taken the next morning.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) If I understand aright the proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] who has charge of this bill, it is that we shall now in Committee of the Whole come to an understanding, to be carried out in the House, that the further consideration of this bill shall be continued on Wednesday evening next, and that should the previous question be called and sustained at the close of that evening session the vote upon the bill and pending amendments shall not be taken until the following day. That I think is very proper, and I hope that the members of this committee will come to such an understanding. The House alone has the power to enforce such an order or understanding, but it will probably conform to the wish of this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the committee can make no order upon such an understanding.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Allow me to inquire if that understanding will include the right to discuss this bill by sections during the day session of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition is to have the discussion in the evening session.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Of course all the rules of the House which apply to such cases would apply to this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. My object is to secure a debate of this bill by sections in a full House, not in a thin House.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The debate will be continued in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BANKS. Is general debate to be closed upon this bill to-night?

The CHAIRMAN. No such order is proposed.

Mr. GIBSON. I understand that the proposition is to continue the debate on this bill next Wednesday evening, and it will not be concluded at that time unless the House shall then so determine.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee cannot now make any order upon the subject. The proposition is submitted to the committee in order that there may be a common understanding in relation to it, so that proper action may be taken in the House after the committee rises. The question now is upon the motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4318) to provide for the organization of the "Mississippi River improvement commission," and for the correction, permanent location, and deepening of the channel, and the improvement of the navigation of said Mississippi River, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I now ask that the further consideration of this bill be continued on Wednesday evening next at half past seven o'clock, and that if the previous question shall be called at the end of that evening session the vote upon the bill and amendments shall be taken the next day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, so far as he can, the understanding arrived at in Committee of the Whole, but which the committee had no power to enforce. The agreement of the Committee of the Whole, and which it expected the House to enforce by its order, is that the House shall sit again on Wednesday evening next for the consideration of the Mississippi levee bill in Committee of the Whole; and if at that session the previous question should be called and sustained, the vote shall not be taken on the bill and amendments pending thereto until the next morning. That requires unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GIBSON. The printed copies of the bill and accompanying report have been exhausted. I move that an additional number of the report, and of the bill, with the amendments proposed thereto, be printed for the use of the House.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I ask unanimous consent that Senate amendments to House bill No. 5067 be taken from the Speaker's table and concurred in. I suppose there will be no objection. The bill has passed the House and the Senate without opposition, and is a meritorious measure.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 5067) to divide the western district of Missouri into two divisions and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I suppose it is not necessary that the amendments be read in full. I believe there is no opposition to concurring in them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the amendments should be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

The western district of Missouri is hereby divided into two divisions, which shall be known as the eastern and western divisions of the western district of Missouri. SEC. 2. All offenses hereafter committed in either of said divisions shall be cognizable and indictable within the division where committed; and all grand and petit jurors summoned for service in each division shall be inhabitants thereof. And all offenses heretofore committed within said district shall be prosecuted and tried as if this act had not passed.

SEC. 3. All civil suits not of a local character which shall be hereafter brought in the district or circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Missouri in either of said divisions, against a single defendant, or where all the defendants reside in the same division of said district, shall be brought in the division in which the defendant or defendants reside; but if there are two or more defendants residing in different divisions, such suit may be brought in either division, and all mesne and final process subject to the provisions of this act, issued in either of said divisions, may be served and executed in either or both of the divisions.

And the clerk shall be responsible for the official acts and neglects of all such deputies.

SEC. 5. All civil suits and proceedings now pending in the circuit or district court of said western district of Missouri, and which would, if instituted after the passage of this act, be required to be brought in the western division of said district, may be transferred, by consent of all the parties, to said western division of said district, and there disposed of in the same manner and with like effect as if the same had been there instituted; and all process, writs, and recognizances relating to such suits and proceedings so transferred shall be considered as belonging to the term of the court in the western division of said district, in the same manner and with like effect as if they had been issued or taken in reference thereto originally.

The SPEAKER. This is a House bill amended by the Senate, so that the bill has passed both Houses.

Mr. KNOTT. I understand that. The amendment of the Senate makes no material change in the bill.

EVENING JOINT SESSION.

Mr. CLYMER. This evening memorial services in commemoration of the late Professor Joseph Henry are to take place in this Hall, and I desire to offer a resolution in relation to that matter, and if it should be adopted by the House I shall follow it with a motion that the House take a recess until a quarter to eight o'clock.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

That at the session to-night the Doorkeeper be directed to admit to the floor all persons, public bodies, and societies indicated by the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, also the wives and daughters of members.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the space in the House will hardly suffice.

Mr. CLYMER. I would say in reply to the suggestion of the Chair that the Doorkeeper is of opinion that they might be accommodated upon one side of the Hall, not in the seats of members, and the public bodies might be accommodated on the other side.

I have confined the resolution expressly to the wives and daughters of members, because if I put in the wives and families the number would be indefinite.

Mr. THOMPSON. Is the meeting to-night a legislative meeting in any sense?

The SPEAKER. It is not; but the House and Senate have voted to participate in this ceremony.

Mr. THOMPSON. Is it to be in any sense an official meeting of the body?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the order made upon the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Congress of the United States will take part in the services to be observed on Thursday evening, January 16, 1879, in honor of the memory of Joseph Henry, late Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, under the auspices of the Regents thereof, and for that purpose the Senators and Representatives will assemble on that evening in the Hall of the House of Representatives, the Vice-President, supported by the Speaker of the House, to preside on that occasion.

Mr. PRICE. But no legislative business to be transacted.

The SPEAKER. No legislative business can be done at any rate in joint session.

Mr. PRICE. But the presumption is that when the House takes a recess, it meets again as a House for business.

The SPEAKER. That is usually a reasonable presumption.

Mr. CLYMER. The Senate has taken a recess, and I suggest that we should pursue the same course.

The resolution of Mr. CLYMER was then adopted.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the House now take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until seven o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired the House resumed its session.

IN MEMORY OF THE LATE JOSEPH HENRY.

At five minutes before eight o'clock, the Senate of the United States preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms and Chaplain, and headed by the Vice-President of the United States with the Secretary, entered the Hall and were properly announced, and the Vice-President took his seat on the right of the Speaker, and the Senators took the seats assigned them.

At eight o'clock the Chief-Justice and associate justices of the Supreme Court, and the President of the United States and the members of the Cabinet, entered the Hall, were properly announced, and were conducted to the seats assigned them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senators and Members of the Congress of the United States, in pursuance of the resolutions of their respective bodies, have assembled for the purpose of taking part in the services to be observed in memory of Joseph Henry, late Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, under the auspices of the Regents of that Institution.

The memorial services (a report of which will appear hereafter) were then proceeded with, and at their conclusion the President of the United States with his Cabinet, the Chief-Justice and associate justices of the Supreme Court, the Senate of the United States with the Vice-President, retired from the Hall.

The SPEAKER then (at eleven o'clock p. m.) said: The object of this evening's session as provided for by the order of both Houses of Congress having been fittingly realized, the duty remains to me to declare this House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I present a memorial of the National Grange on the subject of the unjust discrimination of railroad freights. I ask that it be read and printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the memorial will be read at length.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and read as follows:

To the Honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The National Grange, composed of representative men and women of twenty-seven different States of this Union, were in annual session at Richmond, Virginia, from the 20th November last till the 1st December, inclusive, and during the session instructed their executive committee to memorialize Congress upon the subject of existing discriminations in railroad freights.

Pursuant to these instructions we, the said executive committee, believing that the substitute to House bill No. 3547, presented by Mr. REAGAN, of Texas, is in accord with the views of the National Grange, do earnestly solicit the passage of said bill for the following reasons:

First. That freight charges on all of our through lines of transportation are whimsical and subject to unjust, unreasonable, and violent fluctuations.

Second. Terminal points are invariably accorded discriminations prejudicial to all intermediate points, thereby compelling producers and consumers of one section to pay the transportation of another section of the country.

Third. Railroads are common carriers built by the people for the common weal, and should not be tolerated as arbitrary and crushing monopolies.

Fourth. Competition among parallel lines is no longer a safeguard against monopoly; for organized combination effectually establishes the one and defeats the other, to the great injury of the commerce of the country.

Fifth. Speculators are allowed rebates and drawbacks to such an extent that large capitalists can buy the products of the West at a higher price and sell the same at a lower price in the eastern markets, and yet realize a larger marginal profit than the honest shipper of more limited means.

Sixth. Congress alone can grapple with these mammoth monopolies, who, by reason of their magnitude, either defy or evade the laws of individual States.

And your memorialists would ever pray.

SAMUEL E. ADAMS, Minnesota.
S. H. ELLIS, Ohio.
HENLEY JAMES, Indiana.
D. WYATT AIKEN, South Carolina.

Mr. THURMAN. I present certain resolutions of the city council of the City of Cincinnati, Ohio, adverse to certain provisions of what is called the patent bill now under consideration. The bill having been reported, I move that these resolutions lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Frank S. Witherbee and George Duncan, of New York, praying for the passage of a law changing the name of the steamer Florence Witherbee to The Florence; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONKLING. I have received a petition signed by a number of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions, which passed the Senate yesterday. I suppose I should present the petition, nevertheless. I move that it lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 599) to authorize the killing of fur-seal and other fur-bearing animals within the limits of Alaska Territory, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1582) providing for an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, reported it without amendment.

REPORT ON FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print 5,000 extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1877–'78, have instructed me to report the same without amendment, and to recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed 5,000 extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1877–'78, of which 1,500 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries; the illustrations to be made by the Public Printer under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

Mr. PADDOCK subsequently said: I understand that the resolution reported from the Committee on Printing in reference to the publication of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries was adopted without amendment. My attention was diverted at the time. The number of volumes of that report authorized by the resolution, as I understand it, seems to me to be quite insufficient. This is a most interesting subject, and the report is a very able and interesting and useful one. There is no interest that is attracting greater attention in the country at the present time than that of fish culture. I should like to have a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution was adopted, in order that I may offer an amendment to increase the number, as no more than five thousand copies have been ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution to print extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries was adopted? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move to strike out the word "five," where it occurs before "thousand," and insert the word "fifteen." This is one of the most useful reports that have ever been published by order of Congress.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing how many copies of the report have already been printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. This report has not been printed. This is the usual number that has been printed at previous sessions of Congress.

Mr. SARGENT. It is the report for the year 1877–'78.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think we had better adhere to the usual number.

Mr. ANTHONY. The report is certainly a very valuable one, and very interesting to the whole country.

Mr. PADDOCK. The demand for the report last year was universal almost. So far as my experience goes at least, that was the fact, and it was almost impossible to get a copy of the report.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt the report is very valuable to certain persons, but I judge it is not such a report as will be generally appreciated. If we depart now from the usual number, it will become a precedent to be followed hereafter in reference to all these reports. We are doing a very large amount of printing in the Senate. There are a great many other reports besides those on the subject of fish and fisheries that we ought to have printed; but if we keep on multiplying the editions of reports that have already been printed and continue to print large numbers, I do not know where we shall stop.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the report of the commissioner and the work of the commissioner has proved a splendid success, as has been witnessed in every place where it has been tested on rivers, lakes, and on the ocean, increasing the amount of food of the country, so that living is to be made cheaper hereafter. I regard the work as perhaps one of the most useful that has ever been encouraged by Congress. I therefore hope that a larger number of this report than was proposed by the Committee on Printing will be printed.

Mr. BECK. I do not know that I have anything to add to what has been said by the Senator from Vermont; but as I have the floor I desire to say that I have looked into this question with some care, and I believe that we ought to have at least fifteen thousand copies of the report. All over the section of the country which I represent demand is made for them, and the people take such an interest in them as I have never seen taken in other reports. I have tried to buy copies in order to supply the demand. Of course it is a report on fish and fisheries, but it is something that everybody seems to want to know about. The subject is new. Professor Baird in late years has made immense discoveries in regard to the power of developing fish everywhere; and he is still going on with the work. All along the coast everywhere he is showing the people how to make the waters of the country produce food for the people, perhaps more abundantly than the best land in the country. I hope the amendment will be agreed to, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Delaware. I know that we have never printed a report of more value to every one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, increasing the number of copies from five thousand to fifteen thousand.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. The resolution will require an additional amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. The resolution should now be referred back to the Committee on Printing for correction, because as the number is increased from 5,000 to 15,000 the distribution of the report should be differently arranged. I therefore suggest that it be recommitted to the committee that the details of the resolution may be corrected.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think in a moment the relative increase in the distribution may be arranged. I think the Secretary has already made the computation.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well. I withdraw the suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As thus amended, to make the distribution agree with the increased number, will the Senate agree to the resolution?

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

NARRATIVE OF POLARIS EXPEDITION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print 1,000 copies of the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition for sale, to report it without amendment, and to recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 1,000 copies of the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition for sale by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, at the cost of publication with 10 per cent. added thereto.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee have always been very anxious to promote the sale of public documents. An edition of this book was printed for sale with some hesitation on the part of the Senate, but the whole edition has been exhausted and there are calls for additional copies.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1636) for the relief of Henry T. Fuller and others, sureties upon the official bond of William H. Waterman, formerly superintendent of Indian affairs for Washington Territory, and from liability on the judgment rendered on such bond; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1637) granting a pension to Hugh O'Neil; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1638) to appoint Spruille Braden an ensign in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1639) to authorize the purchase of a life-size portrait of the late Major-General George H. Thomas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1640) for the relief of Jacob D. Felthousen and the heirs of William H. Akins; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I introduce the bill by request, as it is for the extension of a patent-right; and I am, as a matter of course, not committed to the support of the bill by introducing it, nor am I committed against it. I move its reference to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I also move, in connection with the bill just introduced, that the bill (S. No. 553) for the relief of William H. Akins and Jacob D. Felthousen, their heirs and assigns, which was reported on the 10th of May, 1878, by the chairman of the Committee on Patents, and the accompanying report, be recommitted to the Committee on Patents, that they may consider the bill just introduced in lieu of the original bill, and act upon it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAMAR asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1641) for the relief of the Vicksburgh and Meridian Railroad Company from taxes improperly paid; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1642) to amend section 5356 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-roads herein named; which was referred to the Committe on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

SUPPLY OF WATER ON CAPITOL HILL.

Mr. DORSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, directed to report to the Senate what action by Congress, if any, is necessary to secure to the residents of Capitol Hill, and other elevated portions of the city of Washington, a proper supply of water; what appropriation of money, if any, is required for this purpose; and to transmit to the Senate such facts relating thereto as they may deem important.

HALL'S SECOND ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of the Narrative of Hall's Second Arctic Expedition, of which 1,200 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,400 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 150 copies for the use of the Navy Department, 250 copies for the use of the Naval Observatory, and 1,000 copies to be sold by the Public Printer, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, at the cost of printing and binding, with an addition of 10 per cent.

TRANSACTIONS OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I submit a resolution of inquiry.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of the amount of commissions or other compensation paid to bankers, brokers, firms, companies, syndicates, and individuals for services in negotiating the sale of bonds and other obligations of the United States from the year 1862 until the present time; when, and to whom, such commissions or compensation was paid, and when paid to syndicates, firms, corporations, or companies, to state the names of the persons composing the same; and also to inform the Senate whether any, and, if any, what amount of commissions or other compensation has been paid to bankers, brokers, firms, companies, syndicates, and individuals for services rendered in refunding any of the bonds of the United States, and, if any such payments have been made, to state when and to whom made; and, also, whether interest has been paid on called bonds at the same time that interest was accruing on the bonds sold to redeem the same, and whether such double interest has been uniformly paid while the refunding operation has been in progress or on bonds sold for resumption purposes, specifying whether there has been any exception to such payments of double interest, and who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time of such exception, and how much double interest has been paid on each class of bonds and the total amount thereof, and whether the money received for bonds sold by any bank or syndicate has in all cases been allowed to remain on deposit with the national banks acting as Government depositories pending the call of bonds, specifying the names of the banks and the length of time during which the proceeds of the bonds sold have been left on deposit with each bank, and whether at any time any gold coin has been delivered by the Treasury to any parties concerned in the negotiation of United States bonds or otherwise in exchange for or upon the security of United States bonds, or in advance of the payment thereof, pending any call of bonds on which interest was allowed or paid up to the date of the maturity of the call, and also whether any money in the Treasury held for the payment of overdue called bonds has been left on deposit without interest in any Government depository, and what was the largest amount thereof at any one time, stating the names of the banks in which such money was deposited, and what security the Treasury held for the payment thereof when demanded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to this resolution?

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, if the Senator introducing the resolution proposes to have it referred to the Committee on Finance, I have no objection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. It certainly ought to go to the Committee on Finance. To resolutions asking for legitimate information I have, for one, not the slightest objection; but I think it the part of prudence not to impose a vast amount of work upon the department, involving the labor of thirty or forty clerks for a month, unless there is some good object to be attained. I do not know but that a large portion of the information asked for is already in print; but I think it is eminently a resolution that ought first to be considered by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I believe a mere resolution of inquiry it is not usual to refer to any committee. This is a mere inquiry to be made of the Secretary of the Treasury about matters which he will be able to answer. There is no doubt but that he can give an answer without much labor or without much hesitation. It simply inquires as to matters of which the people have a right to know.

Mr. MORRILL. I must object to its consideration now, unless the Senator will allow it to go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir; I prefer that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over under the rule.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HOWE. I have a letter from the Treasury Department asking that certain papers used in the case of Harlow J. Phelps be returned to the Treasury Department. They are required in New York on Monday next. I ask that the order may be made at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be entered.

MRS. MARIA B. CRAIG.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the order of the Senate, made at the present session, indefinitely postponing the bill (H. R. No. 3116) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Maria B. Craig, may be reconsidered and the bill again referred to the Pension Committee of the Senate. I have spoken to the chairman of that committee and he makes no objection to this reconsideration. There are certain reasons, with which I need not interrupt the Senate, why I think this action ought to be had.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? To the proposition of the Senator from Ohio the Chair hears no objection. The order will be entered.

RESTORATION OF COURT RECORDS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5315) to restore the records and files in the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Texas, lately destroyed by fire. I make this motion because it is very important to the interests of justice between private parties, and the United States as well, that the records which were unhappily destroyed there should be restored immediately. Everything of course is at a stand-still. I ask the Senate, therefore, to take up the bill now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu to insert:

That section 902 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

In any proceedings in conformity with law to restore the records of any court of the United States which have been or may be hereafter lost or destroyed, the notice required may be served on any non-resident of the district in which such court is held anywhere within the jurisdiction of the United States or in any foreign country; the proof of service of such notice, if made in a foreign country, to be certified by a minister or consul of the United States in such country, under his official seal.

SEC. 2. That section 903 of said Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

A certified copy of the official return, or any other official paper of the United States attorney, marshal, or clerk, or other certifying or recording officer of any court of the United States, made in pursuance of law, and on file in any department of the Government, relating to any cause or matter to which the United States was a party in any such court, the record of which has been or may be lost or destroyed, may be filed in the court to which it appertains, and shall have the same force and effect as if it were an original paper or other document made to or filed in such court; and in any case in which the names of the parties and the date and amount of judgment or decree shall appear from such return, paper, or document, it shall be lawful for the court in which they are filed to issue the proper process to enforce such decree or judgment, in the same manner as if the original record remained in said court. And in all cases where any of the files, papers, or records of any court of the United States have been or shall be lost or destroyed, the files, records, and papers which, pursuant to law, may have been or may be restored or supplied in place of such records, files, and papers, shall have the same force and effect, to all intents and purposes, as the originals thereof would have been entitled to.

SEC. 3. That section 904 of said Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

That whenever any of the records or files in which the United States are interested of any court of the United States have been or may be lost or destroyed, it shall be the duty of the attorney of the United States for the district or court to which such files and records belong, so far as the judges of such courts respectively shall deem it essential to the interests of the United States for such records and files to be restored or supplied, to take such steps, under the direction of said judges, as may be necessary to effect such restoration or substitution, including such dockets, indices, and other books and papers as said judges shall think proper. Said judges may direct the performance, by the clerks of said courts repectively and by the United States attorneys, of any duties incident thereto; and said clerks and attorneys shall be allowed such compensation for services in the matter and for lawful disbursements as may be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, upon a certificate by the judges of said courts stating that such claim for services and disbursements is just and reasonable; and the sum so allowed shall be paid out of the judiciary fund.

Mr. MAXEY. I simply desire to say that the bill as it passed the House restored the records of the district and circuit courts of the western district of Texas, which were destroyed in November last by fire. The entire business of that court has been clogged ever since by reason of the loss of the records. The Judiciary Committee thought proper, as it was a special bill for a special purpose, to use it as a basis for a general bill, and therefore they have presented the amendment which covers the object had in view by the bill as it passed the House and takes into consideration all like cases. I ask that the amendment be adopted, and that the bill be passed as recommended by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the committee to which this bill was referred found on an examination of the bill and upon consultation with the head of the Department of Justice that the bill itself was defective in respect of the very purposes it had in view. Although it followed exactly the provisions of an act about the records that were destroyed in Illinois a few years ago, there was an omission in respect of giving effect to the restoration of those papers, which was extremely dangerous. It was therefore necessary to make an amendment. That being ascertained, we thought it better to make a general provision, about half of which already exists in the Revised Statutes and the other half does not. As to the half that already exists, in respect of the records of private parties, the committee made a general provision to cover the future as well as the past, where the records and files of a court may unhappily be destroyed. I presume this brief explanation will be satisfactory to the Senate as to the propriety of putting the bill in this form.

Having made that statement, I notice one or two clerical or typographical errors in the amendment which I beg to have corrected. In section 2 of the amendment, line 11, after the word "original," should be inserted the words "report, return," so as to read:

And shall have the same force and effect as if it were an original report, return, paper, or other document made to or filed in such court.

It does not make grammar as it is now. It is a clerical omission.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That amendment will be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then in section 3, line 9, the word "for" should read "that." It now reads—

So far as the judges of such courts respectively shall deem it essential to the interests of the United States for such records and files to be restored or supplied.

"For" should be "that," in order to make it proper and grammatical reading; and "to" after the word "files" should be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That amendment will also be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That being done, I believe the committee's amendment needs no further amendment.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, as modified, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to records and files in the district and circuit courts of the United States destroyed by fire."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 109) defining the manner in which certain land-scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 5067) to divide the western district of Missouri into two divisions, and to prescribe the time and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 5067) to divide the western district of Missouri into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4234) to provide that all pensions on account of death, or wounds received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, which have been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall commence from the date of death or discharge from the service of the United States; for the payment of arrears of pensions, and other purposes.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of the Senate is the consideration of the bill for the revision of the patent laws, and it comes up under the rule without a motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. This day was assigned for the consideration of unobjected cases on the Calendar. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire, who has yielded so graciously and gracefully to several other bills, will yield to these and allow the Calendar to be proceeded with.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I shall be obliged to refuse the request of my friend, the Senator from Rhode Island.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order of the Senate in reference to unobjected cases on the Calendar would take effect at one o'clock, in the absence of the unfinished business of the Senate, which has priority.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under the rule that was adopted for to-day.

Mr. WADLEIGH. My motion has precedence, I think. I have moved to take up Senate bill No. 300.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Such a motion is not necessary. The bill comes up of course under the rule. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of considering the general Calendar under the rule which was adopted on his motion for to-day. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senate will agree to take up the Calendar. We are toward the close of the last session of this Congress, and there are a great many bills on the Calendar which will be lost unless they are acted upon at once. The bill amending the patent law is sure to have consideration. It has had consideration during the whole session, and I think it is going to take the remainder of the time.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Senate bill No. 300 will have to go to the House very soon in order to have action upon it there at this session. Consideration upon it has proceeded to a considerable length, and the debates are fresh in the minds of Senators. My friend, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] assures me that he is not aware of any further considerable discussion, and the prospect is that in a very short time to-day we shall pass the bill and dispose of it. I ask my friend, the Senator from Rhode Island, to give me an opportunity to pass that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that the Senate lay aside the pending and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the general Calendar.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 15, noes 20; not a quorum voting.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I suggest that there be another division. There are a number of us here who did not understand the question.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have a new division first.

Mr. McDONALD. My object is simply to get a quorum.

Mr. THURMAN. There is manifestly a quorum here.

Mr. CONKLING. Another division will reveal a quorum.

Mr. McDONALD. Very well, let there be another division, then.

The question being again put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 22. So the motion was not agreed to.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is, in section 2, line 10, to strike out all after the word "cases," where it first occurs, down to and including the word "awarded," in line 23; in line 27, to strike out all after the word "case," down to and including the word "recovery," in line 29; and to strike out lines 36, 37, 38, 39, and down to and including the word "aforesaid," in line 40, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

No account of profits or savings shall in any case be allowed; but evidence thereof may be admitted as tending to prove what shall be deemed a reasonable license fee as compensation for the infringement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Senator from Ohio tell us what the state of the law will be, that amendment being adopted and becoming a law, in respect of cases in equity, in view of the provision of the Constitution respecting trials by jury. I happened to be present the other day in a court of the United States, where a patent cause was on hearing, and I heard one of the counsel maintain with earnestness——

Mr. WHYTE. We should like to hear the Senator from Vermont, but the noise in the Chamber is so great that it is impossible.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Order! Senators will please be seated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was saying, Mr. President, that I desire to have the Senator from Ohio explain to us what in his opinion, if he chooses to give it, the state of the law will be if this provision is to become a law in such a way that the patent laws simply provide that there shall be no account of profits in cases in equity where there are now accounts of profits, but that the rule shall be a rule of damages to be measured in a certain way, in view of what I was stating when the Senator from Maryland rose, that happening the other day to be in a circuit court of the United States where a patent cause was on argument, I heard a very distinguished counsel make with earnestness and sincerity the point, under the existing law even, that the provision of the Constitution requiring trial by jury (with which we are all familiar and which I need not recite) stood in the way, notwithstanding the statute, of the right of a court of equity to proceed to ascertain any damages at all; and therefore that the decree of the court in that case which was being settled, the rights of the parties having already been pronounced upon on the same occasion or before, must be confined, notwithstanding the existing statute, to taking an account of profits and savings. Now, then, if by statute we erase from the jurisdiction and right of a court of equity the power to take an account of profits and savings, if the point of this gentleman was correct, we shall have deprived the courts of equity in all patent cases of any right to give any redress at all except a simple injunction. What I desire is an explanation from my honorable friend from Ohio on that point.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, as I understand the matter, as the law now stands, the owner of a patent-right which has been infringed has his election to pursue one or the other of two remedies. He may bring his action at law to recover damages for the infringement, and the amount of his damages is a question to be determined by the verdict of a jury upon the evidence adduced before it showing the loss to which he has been subjected by virtue of this infringement of his rights; or he may pursue his remedy in equity, which is for the purpose of obtaining an injunction to restrain and prohibit the defendant from infringing upon his rights, and on obtaining an injunction on the hearing upon the merits, which is a final adjudication of the rights of the parties, perpetuating that injunction he is then, according to the course of practice in courts of equity, entitled to have compensation for the injury which he has been compelled to submit to in the mean time by virtue of the fact or the law that the court of equity having obtained jurisdiction of the cause for one purpose is entitled to hold it in order to do complete justice between the parties.

In rendering that compensation the practice of courts of equity adopting a rule to that end is to turn the defendant convicted as a wrong-doer into a trustee de son tort and to charge him as if he had in law and in fact occupied a fiduciary relation toward the owner of the property, and so take an account of the profits which the defendant had made in the mean time by the use of the plaintiff's property. The bill as reported by the committee abolishes the distinction between the rule of damages in actions at law and the rule of compensation based upon an account of profits as it has heretofore obtained in courts of equity; and the amendment proposed by me does not touch that part of the bill. The committee seek to substitute for the existing rule in equity practice as to profits another rule in respect to profits, also interpolating into the action at law an account in certain excepted cases of actual profits, but in both instances, in both rules, excluding that which may become in some cases necessarily a part of the very computation necessary to arrive at what actual profits may be.

My proposition was intended not to interfere with the main purpose of the section in respect to reducing to unity and identity the rules of equity and of common law in respect to the measurement of the compensation, but to have one rule in both cases and to substitute for all accounts of either savings or profits the ordinary common-law rule giving to the complainant who had suffered an injury by the use of the property by another what in the opinion of the tribunal constituted for that purpose should be a fair, reasonable, full, adequate compensation for that loss; and I do not understand that a man loses more or less in point of fact because he happens to seek his remedy by an action at law or by a suit in equity. So that I do not understand that any constitutional provision is violated unless it be one which undertakes because the suit is in equity merely to prescribe by statute a rule of compensation which is different from that heretofore adopted by the courts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My point was not that this proposition of the Senator from Ohio violated any constitutional rule; but it was an inquiry whether, supposing this point about the Constitution to be a sound one, (in regard to which I express no opinion,) it was the purpose to deprive a court of equity of any power to give any other redress in any patent cause except the simple injunction, because the effect of the amendment is to cut off from a court of equity any jurisdiction to take an account of actual profits even, which the committee's bill provides for. Therefore a court of equity under this amendment has no power to take an account of actual profits. Then what is it to do? It is to take an account of damages. But, say the gentlemen who contend that way, the Constitution does not allow a court of equity to take an account of damages per se; you may take the damages into consideration in connection with the question of estimating profits, but per se it has not any jurisdiction. The effect, therefore, of this amendment would be, supposing this claim about the Constitution to be correct, to say that a court of equity shall not under any circumstances give any other redress in a patent cause than the simple prohibition of use, turning over the party to a court of law to get his damages, to the great benefit, I may add, of all lawyers and other people of that kind, because they have two suits instead of one.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, this amendment had been debated at great length prior to the adjournment last night, and a vote had been taken upon it, six voting in favor and thirty-two against it, barely lacking a quorum, which necessitated another call of the roll. I do not propose after that to say anything more upon this amendment. I trust now that we shall have a vote.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to say a word before the vote is again taken. Upon the vote of yesterday I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio on the yeas and nays, simply on the idea that I regard the present patent law as in many instances doing great injustice to the people; and sympathizing very fully, so far as I am advised, with what has been said by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] and by those gentlemen who seek to curtail the power of patentees over the people, I thought I was voting for an amendment that did help to curtail it. If, however, it is unconstitutional or there is any difficulty on that point, I do not desire to go so far in my efforts to curtail the power of patentees as to do anything that is in violation of the Constitution. Therefore I suppose I shall change my vote and vote against the amendment, if there is any doubt on that subject. I only desire to add that I shall never fail to vote to curtail the present rights of patentees, which I think are absolutely enormities in many regards.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, after the expression of opinion indicated by the vote of yesterday, I ask leave of the Senate to withdraw the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I now propose the amendments of which I have given notice. I do not care about discussing them. They have been incidentally discussed throughout this debate; I discussed them as fully as I could on the 20th of December, and they have been discussed substantially by the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from New York, and others.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be reported and acted upon separately. The first will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, lines 11 and 12, it is proposed to strike out the words "for sale or," and in line 12 insert after the word "selling" the words "or using;" so as to read:

Except in cases where the defendant has made an actual profit from making selling, or using the thing patented, or the product thereof.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will read a part of the section:

If a license fee has already been established by a reasonable number of transactions applicable to the case at bar, such license fee, or a portion thereof, according to the extent and duration of the infringement proved, shall be the measure of the plaintiff's recovery in all cases, except in cases where the defendant has made an actual profit from making for sale, or selling the thing patented, or the product thereof.

I want to amend it so as to strike out the words "for sale" in the eleventh line and insert in the twelfth line the words "or using," so as to read if amended, "the defendant has made an actual profit from making, selling, or using the thing patented or the product thereof." An account of profits under this is confined now by this section to cases where the thing patented or the product thereof is sold. I want to extend it so that where service is performed by railroad companies, where anybody is using a patented thing but does not manufacture it for sale, this provision as to an account shall apply.

Mr. McMILLAN. I trust this amendment will not be adopted. The effect of this amendment would be to make every person using a patented article, under any circumstances, without a license from the patentee, liable for profits just as for manufacturing or selling the article. That question was discussed some days ago, and I think the Senate are pretty well satisfied that the principle should not apply to citizens who merely use a patented article for their private purposes, and in many instances without a knowledge of any infringement of a patent, as is the case in the State I have the honor in part to represent at this time, with regard to the drive-well referred to on the day of the former debate, where there are multitudes of suits instituted against our citizens which are very burdensome to them and which involve no principle of justice whatever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But my friend ought to remember that the drive-well was the only thing that enabled Her Majesty's government of Great Britain to conquer that Nubian or whatever other king he was at Magdalla. They could only get across the deserts in that way.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope the Queen of Great Britain will pay for it, then.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not want this amendment to be voted upon on the theory that the drive-well is the sole thing to which it can apply. Here is a railroad company that uses a brake, a mill that uses a patented thing, a manufacturer who uses a patented thing and does not sell it. This may be illustrated by many things used in the building of houses; there are a thousand things that might be mentioned.

I do not care about discussing the question; but I want the Senate to vote understandingly. I do not understand how a railroad company that uses a patented bridge should not pay for it as well as if it sold the thing patented.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I agree with my friend the Senator from Illinois that a railroad company that uses a brake should pay for it. What this bill provides is that the railroad company shall not go into an account of its whole business, everything, and then undertake to apportion the share of the profits of that business due to the use of that railroad-brake. This account for profits, in cases where the invention is simply used, is extremely expensive and long——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. But I would ask the Senator if that is any different from the case of a manufacturer manufacturing India-rubber goods or anything else? Is there any difference at all? You do bring a bill in equity and require an account for profits. You have said here that savings shall not be taken into consideration. Why should not a railroad company, in the thousand cases in which service is performed for it by a patented thing, pay for it the same as for the patented thing itself?

Mr. WADLEIGH. My friend the Senator from Illinois interrupted me in the middle of a sentence, and I shall have to leave the rest of it unsaid because I have forgotten what I was saying. But the distinction between the two cases was very well argued the other day, particularly by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] Where the patented article is sold, or where its product is sold, the case is very different from where a machine or the patented invention is simply used. In the one case there may be some difficulty, and a good deal of difficulty, in taking an account of profits, but in the other case it is generally absolutely impossible to take an account which is at all just.

I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Illinois will not be adopted.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Illinois will amplify by argument his proposition. My friend from New Hampshire said that it had been all argued. Well, but it was before a different jury. It has not been argued here very fully; at least I have not heard it argued very fully, and I do not know that the RECORD discloses any full argument upon the subject.

But why an account of profits or an account of savings in a business where a patented article is used should not be examined into by a court is a matter that I cannot understand. Why a party who infringes a patent by its use should not pay for it is a thing that I cannot understand; and the simple reply is that because his whole business does not actually make a profit, therefore you cannot inquire into the use of the particular patented article——

Mr. WADLEIGH. If the Senator will look at the section he will see that it covers the whole question.

Mr. WHYTE. But this applies only to making for sale or selling the patented article or the product thereof. This is covered up in very fine language. I am rather afraid that there is a snake in this branch of the case. It is not plain enough for a man of ordinary comprehension like myself to see it exactly, and I would rather have it a little plainer. I have read the bill and examined it very carefully; but I saw a bill that had two little words, "if any," in it once, and it was a very serious bill when it came to be carried into execution.

The proposition in the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH,] which seems to have been adopted by the committee, does not cover the case contemplated by the Senator from Illinois, and I do not see why there should not be a close examination into the business, whether it is profitable or not profitable, to ascertain whether by the use of a patented article a branch of that business has not been carried on at a cheaper rate than without the use of that patented article, as for instance——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask if he can see any reason why a trespass committed more than six years ago should not be paid for, as much as a trespass committed six months ago?

Mr. WHYTE. Well, I do not see any reason, except that the statute of limitations bars it.

Mr. HOAR. I know; but I ask for the reason of the statute of limitations. Is not the reason the fact that the experience of mankind shows that more injustice is done by going into an inquiry in regard to transactions more than six years old, involving expense and litigation, than there is by drawing a limit at that period? Now, the testimony of a vast number of persons on both sides of patent questions before the committee was, with remarkable unanimity, to the effect that the habit of going into an account of savings of great business concerns which used patented articles enabled a wealthy complainant, who required it of a defendant, to make patent causes so expensive and burdensome that they broke down the defendants, and enabled wealthy defendants resisting poor and honest complainants to make the pursuit of their remedy so burdensome that they practically destroyed it; and for that reason the committee were of opinion that it would be more just, as a general rule, to abolish accounts of savings altogether, leaving the general amount of damages to be settled, however, by the jury or by the court on the whole evidence in the case, gathering it from the general nature and character of the invention and the business.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I should like to ask a question of the Senator who has just taken his seat: whether the committee took testimony upon the subject as it affects a poor man who has made an invention which all the railroads of the country use? Here is a poor man who makes an invention. All the railroads of the country use it. They combine against him. He has to fight them. He has no money to do it with. They can go on and use his invention and not pay him for it at all. He is in a different position altogether from those who manufacture a thing patented for sale.

Mr. WHYTE. I am much obliged to the Senator from Illinois for answering the question propounded to me by the Senator from Massachusetts. My friend from New Hampshire says that a clause in this bill covers the case which I have just suggested; but it is a remarkable fact that Mr. Raymond, who seems to represent the combined railroad companies of the country, should object to this very amendment of the Senator from Illinois upon the ground that "the second section of the bill proceeds upon the theory that savings resulting from the use of a patent can in no case constitute a just measure of the plaintiff's recovery." There is the very point. Mr. Raymond stands upon the very ground that such an inquiry ought not to be gone into, because it constitutes no just estimate of the measure of damages, though my friend from New Hampshire indicates that it is already covered by the bill, when the lawyer who seems to have been arguing mostly this case before the committee says that the bill excludes any such theory.

This is a new argument, since the bill has been in Committee of the Whole, and the amendments were offered by the Senator from Illinois; it is no old argument, but it is an argument addressed to us now when we are about to vote upon this proposition of the Senator from Illinois. And he cites a case with which I am familiar myself, for I argued one of its branches, the case of Conover, where people used a wood-splitting machine in their business of selling coal and wood, and when we sued them for infringing our wood-splitting-machine patent, the reply was that their whole business had been unprofitable, and that we could not go into an inquiry in regard to the use of our patented article because they had lost money in carrying on a general coal and wood business. And it is just such people to whom this bill, if enacted into a law, will be beneficial. It is to help them. Why should that be so, Mr. President? Because a man carries on a general business improperly, negligently, without good judgment, and loses money by it, if forsooth he uses a patented article in carrying on that business and is asked to pay for it, if we own the patent, we are told that the business has been carried on at a loss, and we cannot go into any inquiry in regard to the use of our particular patent. Mr. President, that cannot be just. Why a patented article should be accounted for if you can sell it, why if it forms a component part of a product that should be paid for, and yet you should not pay for using a patent the property in which is just as valuable and ought to be just as much protected as the property in the other sort of patent, I cannot understand. I cannot see why there should not be an inquiry in regard to the use of a patented article just as much as an inquiry where you sell the article patented.

Mr. WADLEIGH. My friend the Senator from Maryland starts out with the proposition that the infringer of a patent should pay for his use of it. I agree with him entirely in that proposition. He says that the advantage derived from the invention, or the savings which it is capable of making, should also be inquired into. I agree with him in that. Then, where do the Senator from Maryland and myself differ? I cannot state wherein we differ better than by referring to an actual case, the Cawood patent case, which is reported in the fourth volume of Otto. It is one of the swedge-block cases. In that case there were several patents for repairing the exfoliated ends of rails upon railroads. The railroad companies defendants in this case used one of those patents, there being a controversy at the time as to which of the patents infringed upon the other. They repaired their rails according to a certain patent. It turned out that the patent that was used was an infringement upon another patent, the owner of which brought suit against them for that. They offered to prove upon the trial that nothing was saved by the use of this machine at all, because repairing the ends of rails in that way was absolutely useless; that the effect of it was such that in a short time the same exfoliation occurred again, and it was absolutely worthless. The court refused to allow them to do so upon this ground, that when they undertook to use this machine there were two methods open to them; one by taking up the rails and repairing them in the old-fashioned way upon the anvil, which it was estimated would cost thirty-six cents a foot, which I think would be more than the foot of rail would be worth now; the other was by using the plaintiff's machine; and that inasmuch as they chose to use the plaintiff's machine they saved the work that would have been required to be done by the anvil process by the old way, and that they should account for the difference in cost under that rule which exemplifies the doctrine of technical savings that my friend the Senator from Maryland advocates. In that case, where the defendants offered to show and could have shown that they derived no advantage at all from the plaintiff's invention, a decree was rendered for nearly $1,500,000 against the railroads.

Now, my friend, the Senator from Delaware, inquires why the railroads are opposed to that system. Why, Mr. President, I should think they would be. Everybody who does business upon those railroads should be opposed to any rule by which such extortion as that can be wrought out. Such decrees as that would burden the whole business interests of the country if they were enforced; and other injustice equally flagrant has been wrought under the rule to which I refer. Now we say that that shall not be the rule any longer, but that a new rule shall be adopted, and that is that in order to show what the defendant should pay the plaintiff may prove what his machine will save as a part of "the utility and advantage" of the machine, that he may go fully into evidence to show what advantage the machine will effect, what it will save, what it is worth, but that a machine which can produce no useful results whatever, the work of which is good for nothing, shall not be paid for at any such rate as that to which I have alluded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I did not intend to discuss this question at all, and I told the Senator from New Hampshire that I would not discuss it; but discussion has been brought on without any wish of mine.

The Senator from Maryland and the Senator from New Hampshire are discussing a different thing from that to which this amendment applies. I agree that it is very difficult in such a case as the swedge-block case to fix a true invariable rule. I do not believe that in any such case you can fix an invariable rule upon the subject, and my second amendment applies to that because I have left it to the court to say, when they have taken the account of savings, what is a fair compensation under all the circumstances by a reference to the nature, the magnitude of the invention, as well as the use to which it is put.

The swedge-block case I tried myself in connection with Judge Drummond. The Senator from New Hampshire is a little mistaken about it. The old process for mending exfoliated rails was by the anvil. The new process was by Turrill's patent. All the railroads abandoned the old process and used the new. After a while there were inventions that superseded Turrill's, so that they could do it cheaper by other inventions than they could by Turrill's; but they used Turrill's during all the time that the other inventions had not been made, and the question was how much the railroads saved in doing that over the old mode of mending by the anvil and hand. That was a subject of actual, definite computation from the railroads themselves. The judges there felt the force of the objection that this was too much of a remuneration; I agree that it is too much. How are you going to measure that? You must leave it with the court. This man was entitled to something, and although his invention was superseded by others, that was no reason why the railroad companies should use that invention without compensation until it was superseded by others.

What I want to get at in this first amendment is to put all these things alike; and then my subsequent amendment I think improves the section because it leaves the law subject to the court to decide after they have heard the evidence what is a fair remuneration under the circumstances.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I have here the case to which I have referred, and I desire to read a sentence or two from the opinion of the court. The court say:

> It has been argued that it would have been better for these defendants, if, instead of repairing the crushed and exfoliated ends of the rails, they had cut off the ends and relaid the sound parts, or had caused the rails to be rerolled. Experience, it is said, has proved that repairing worn-out ends of rails is not true economy, and hence it is inferred that defendants have derived no profits from the use of the plaintiff's invention. The argument is plausible, but it is unsound. Assuming that experience has demonstrated what is claimed, the defendants undertook to repair their injured rails. They had the choice of repairing them on the common anvil or on the complainant's machine. By selecting the latter they saved a large part of what they must have expended in the use of the former. To that extent they had a positive advantage, growing out of their invasion of the complainant's patent. If their general business was unprofitable, it was the less so in consequence of their use of the plaintiff's property. (4 Otto, 710, Cawood Patent.)

In that case the court assumes that the railroad companies would have repaired those rails by the anvil process at a cost of thirty-six cents a foot if they had not had the plaintiff's invention to repair them with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in reply to the last statement made by the Senator from Illinois. He says that by the adoption of his amendment we get rid of those general or universal rules so as to do justice in each particular case. Now, I contend that the adoption of that amendment will put into this bill an iron rule which will adopt a rule of recovery entirely independent of any idea of mere compensation. As the bill now stands the user of a patent is not liable to account for profits, but he is liable for all damages done, all the injury to the patentee——

Mr. CONKLING. Who is?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The infringer, the mere user, is, as the bill now stands, liable to all damages; a full compensation can be recovered from him; as the bill now stands profits cannot. With the amendment of the Senator from Illinois profits can be.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Savings cannot but profits can.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am speaking now of the mere user of a patent. The case is exactly as I put it. The mere user of a patent, under the bill as it now stands, is not liable to account for profits, but with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois he will be liable to account for profits; and now what are those profits? They are not founded at all on the idea of compensation; and if the Senator will look to the ninety-third United States Reports, pages 68 to 71, he will fine that all idea of profits being placed upon the ground of compensation is utterly abandoned, that it stands purely on the fiction of a trust, and that the profits recovered may be ten, even a hundred fold more than a just compensation, and yet they would have to be allowed under the rule. His amendment, therefore, not only adopts all the abuses which have grown up in the course of time under this system of patent laws, but it even makes them worse for it fixes them by statute.

The Senator from Illinois argues as if no remedy were left to a patentee in case of a mere user infringing the patent. Why, sir, there is a full remedy left, an adequate remedy left to recover entire compensation in damages.

Mr. CONKLING. Where is that in the bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I put the user upon a different footing.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am hardly in a condition of health to continue this discussion, but I have undertaken to show heretofore, and I think I have shown, that there should be a distinction in favor of the mere user of a patented article, which he purchases only for his own use of a manufacturer really and practically in good faith. There is every reason why he should account for nothing more than a just compensation for the injury; but adopt this amendment of the Senator from Illinois, and every purchaser of a mowing-machine, every purchaser of a patented plow, every purchaser of any farming implement, although he purchases in good faith, will be responsible not only for the real damages but for all the profits it can be shown he has made.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it is not the habit of the Senator from Michigan to make assertions touching matters of law without having some reason, commonly I think a good one, for whatever he says. That Senator has told the Senate now that the user—and by that he means one who knowingly uses the patent of another——

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. That was not the case I put, but the bill would cover it in both cases.

Mr. CONKLING. What was not the case the Senator put?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I stated the case of a man purchasing, for instance, a mowing-machine, or a plow, or any other farming implement, which he generally does, as we all know, practically, in entire good faith without any knowledge that he is infringing a patent.

Mr. CONKLING. I remember, Mr. President, that once when a very celebrated lawyer in our State was opening a case before Chancellor Walworth the chancellor put in as quickly as the Senator does now, and said he supposed it was such a case. "No," Mr. Reynolds said; and when the chancellor had supposed several cases, finally Mr. Reynolds said: "Your Honor cannot guess what it is if you should guess an hour." So it is possible that the Senator from Michigan cannot guess what I am going to say before I have said it, if he were to guess again. The particular thing that he has guessed now is not the thing which I was going to say. Let me proceed now, if I can, to bring that to the mind of the honorable Senator. I am not talking about an innocent person who buys a rat-trap for use in his kitchen and who is afterward notified by somebody that the man who sold that rat-trap violated his patent. I want to take, for instruction from the Senator, the case of a man who takes a patented invention, not the product of it, and uses that patented invention in his business, whether it is an air-brake on a railway or a spark-arrester for a locomotive, or any other thing the Senator shall please. He manufactures it, not for sale, but for use, and using it he saves very largely in his business, but he does not sell, and in that sense he does not make profit. I understood the Senator from Michigan to affirm that under this bill now commended to us, should it become a statute, the patentee in the case supposed can recover full compensation for such an act. Does he say so?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If the Senator from New York will allow me to state what I meant by that, I will explain.

Mr. CONKLING. First, if my honorable friend will forgive me, I want to ascertain from him if I am right in supposing that he so said. That is the first step.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator repeat it again?

Mr. CONKLING. I will, though by the time I have repeated it again I am afraid I shall not understand it myself. [Laughter.]

I understand the honorable Senator to affirm that if a person engaged in manufactures, for example, appropriates the patented invention of another and uses it in his business, not manufacturing it for sale, but manufacturing it for his own use and convenience, and by this use saves and I will say saves largely, the patentee whose rights are thus violated can on that state of facts recover full compensation. I believe I borrow his words, and I ask him if he did not so state?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I did, undoubtedly.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, will the Senator be kind enough to take the bill and point to me the provision under which he makes that answer, and then I shall be glad to know what he means by it. But first I want him to instruct me that I may understand what provision of the bill he is talking about.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will state to the Senator, without even looking at the bill, that that case is provided for in this way: the complainant, the patentee, it is declared, shall recover a license fee such as shall be established by the whole evidence in the case, and that license fee is of course to be found according to the amount of injury which has been sustained. That is what amounts to a fair compensation in the case of a patent which in its nature is one which can only be made profitable by being used by others. There is another class of patents, to which I have heretofore alluded, where it would be manifestly for the interest of the inventor to retain the monopoly of the patent himself and prevent others from manufacturing the article, where profits should be given.

Now, I wish to state right here, to save the Senator the opportunity of replying to what I have not said, that if he had paid attention as closely to my argument as I have to his, he would have seen that I have already said, in a speech which I delivered here some time ago, that as to willful infringers, whoever they are, I have no objection to the rule of profits. I admit that the bill here presented does not provide for that case, and I should like it better if it did.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has given me now a translation of what he said, and I think a translation of a translation. He began by affirming that the bill provided that such a party as I have supposed might recover full compensation. If I mistake not, those were his words. As a lawyer, he knows what those words mean; they are terms of art—"full compensation." And now he explains that there is a provision in the bill under which he thinks evidence may be given about savings, not in order to measure the damages, not in order to tell the jury what "full compensation" is, but to aid the court in determining a license fee.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY, (in his seat.) The value of the improvement; what the patentee ought to be allowed for it.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend, even speaking quietly in his seat, will not say to me, he will not say in the presence of lawyers, and, therefore, he will not say were he alone, that that is full compensation or compensation at all, within the meaning of the law or within the meaning of equity. It is not so. On the contrary, the distinction is as broad as any legal distinction can be. I have, (to suppose a case,) trespassed upon my friend's land; I have broken his close; I have cut down his timber and committed waste; and he sues me in trespass, and he is entitled to recover full compensation. Now, suppose a statute should provide that evidence might be given to determine how much I should pay him annually for a right of way across his premises, and then some man were to get up and say "that provision is for the measure of damages, and it provides full compensation for this trespass!" Every lawyer listening to him would presume that he was in jest, or that he was strangely mystified. So the Senator from Michigan will take no offense at me saying that it seems to me that if his assertion rests upon this provision, which I want to say a word about, in regard to the license fee, it falls very far short indeed of a warrant for asserting that under this act a patentee so treated can recover full compensation.

But I call the attention of the Senator to the real meaning, as it seems to me, of this paragraph, beginning on line 36:

> No account of savings shall in any case be allowed;—

That is very plain, stopping there—

> and no evidence or account of the defendant's profits shall in any case be admitted, except as to actual profits resulting from making for sale or selling the thing patented, or the product thereof as aforesaid.

Mr. President, consider for one moment the repugnance, the contradiction of that provision. Here is a distinction established by statute law. What is the distinction? It is that in the case of one set of parties a certain thing shall not be permitted, but they shall be deprived of that altogether, and in the case of another class it shall be allowed fully. That would seem to imply that here was one class meritorious and deserving as contrasted with the other. Is that true? Let us look a moment:

> No evidence or account of the defendant's profits shall in any case be admitted, except as to actual profits resulting from making for sale or selling the thing patented, or the product thereof as aforesaid.

There is a provision for full compensation, in the language of the Senator, against whom? Against all individuals, great and small alike who, manufacturing for sale, make a profit, who using the invention to produce articles or materials of any sort for sale make a profit. They are subjected to the rigors of an account, in the technical sense, and evidence of the account. Who are excluded? We know not from this bill, but from other information of which we cannot fail to take notice we do know who the excluded parties are, namely the strong, the rich, the powerful, the owners of aggregated capital, the great mill-owners, the railway corporations of the country. They cannot be visited; why? Because they are not manufacturing for sale, they are not selling the patented invention, they are not selling the product of it; but they are using it to nourish and conduct and make profitable the vast enterprise which they carry on: and therefore a provision deemed not too rigorous for the small and feeble individual is said to be inadmissible for them.

Mr. President, I say such a provision as that is repugnant, it is inconsistent, it is arbitrary; it is worse because, making a distinction between classes, it does not distinguish between classes who stand in parity with each other, nor in favor of a class more meritorious than another, but it distinguishes in favor of the powerful, in favor of those who do not need defense, who are able to keep themselves with their own sword, and against those who are comparatively helpless, defenseless, weak. And therefore if the honorable Senator from Michigan were right in saying that this provision is for full compensation and just compensation, why not apply it to all? Why not apply it as well to the blacksmith who uses in shoeing the horses that come to his shop a wrought nail turned down by a patented machine, or a nail which he himself produces by a patented process? Why not exempt him and the wagon-maker and the small dealer and manufacturer, even though he may make a profit on what he sells, and does of course in order to live? Why not protect him by the same shield which is thrown over the great variety of strong and powerful parties upon whom this section is to operate?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. In the case put, the blacksmith would be protected against accounting for profits.

Mr. CONKLING. You mean in respect of his horse-shoeing. How would he be protected?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Because he is not a manufacturer: he does not make it for sale.

Mr. CONKLING. There the honorable Senator begs the question. Perhaps he is and perhaps he is not.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I took the case you put.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg your pardon, you do not take the case I put. I stated it in the alternative. I say he uses nails covered by a patent, or perhaps he buys those nails manufactured, or perhaps he makes them himself. Here is a little machine which makes wood screws, and there is a long history connected with wood screws. Some man buys one of those patented machines, and he makes his wood screws himself and uses them in his business, and the articles into which the wood screws go are sold; that is, the screws themselves are sold. That man is liable to all the rigors and inquisition of an account within the broadest meaning of that term.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. By this bill?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir; by this bill:

> No account of savings shall in any case be allowed; and no evidence or account of the defendant's profits shall in any case be admitted, except as to actual profits resulting from making for sale or selling the thing patented, or the product thereof as aforesaid.

Therefore by this bill I answer yes; and side by side with this little smith's shop or this little tinker's establishment, which is thus to be visited, stands some colossal mill on every loom and mule and machine in which there are half a dozen of these same machines pirated, and under this bill no account can be taken.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If they make the product of the machine, certainly there can.

Mr. CONKLING. Not unless they make an actual profit in that regard.

Mr. BOOTH. Not unless they make an actual profit in each case. There is a perfect parity between the cases.

Mr. CONKLING. Except in this, where the great disparity appears: a blacksmith who is engaged in making nails for sale, in point of fact does make a profit on those nails if he sells them, not inevitably and invariably, but practically, nine hundred and ninety-nine times in a thousand, whereas a railway company which is using all manner of patented inventions and making the things itself may or may not be making money, especially in these times, on all its passenger business and all its freight business and its construction account and rolling-stock account and all its other accounts carried in. I have heard the honorable Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] in some of his most felicitous moments, giving sketches and more than vague ideas of the possibilities of railway accounts; and when you come to confine it to people who are making an actual profit, and making an actual profit in a particular way in a vastly complicated business, it is a very different thing from applying it, as this bill does, to all the minute and small interests of a man engaged in doing a single thing on which he must be making a profit if he makes any profit at all, because that is the only one thing that reaches the case.

Now, Mr. President, I do not believe it will do to refuse to amend this second section and as the only excuse for refusing amendment to assert that the patentee whose property is pirated by one who only makes a saving is put by the bill upon a par with the same patentee whose invention is infringed by somebody else differently engaged in respect of whom you say "profits" rather than "savings." I do not believe the ingenuity of man can either explain or torture this section to mean any such thing as that. There is a broad distinction made here; and the argument which sustains this section as it is proves too much. If the argument is good to show that there should be no account taken in the case of savings, that argument will show that there should be no account taken in the case of profits; and if it does not show that, it does not show anything.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am not aware that the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois raises at all the distinction between savings and profits. That is a question about which I was not speaking and have not been speaking to-day, although I have spoken about it heretofore. But I wish the attention of the Senator from New York at the present moment to one case which he puts, that is the case of the blacksmith who makes use of a patented machine and makes horse-nails himself and then uses them in his business and sells his work. He says, if I understand him correctly, that the blacksmith would not be liable to account under this bill——

Mr. CONKLING. I have not said that.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. I said exactly the other thing.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am glad to understand that.

Mr. CONKLING. I said that some blacksmith at a cross-roads who in his business is using a patent and not selling the thing he makes from the patent but selling the product that comes out of that and his labor would be liable to an account and to all the inquisition as it was called of an account, and although a great establishment right next-door to him might be doing the same thing fifty-fold, unless you show that they were making a profit on the whole over and above all losses in any branch of their business they would not be liable at all.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The measure of profits is not what we are now talking about, but the question of whether profits shall be substituted in the place of mere damages. That is the point and the only point raised by the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois. I shall answer the Senator's argument just so far as it relates to that and nothing else.

I will again advert to the fact that there are certain classes of patents where it is clearly for the interest of the patentee not to allow the use of his invention by others. That class I am not now discussing. But the Senator from New York says that adequate compensation is not given in cases where parties manufacture for their own use a patented article and do not sell it. I replied to that that adequate compensation is given under the provisions of this bill by way of giving a license fee. Now there are two classes of cases in which a license fee is given by this bill. First, where the patentee has already sold rights or given licenses in a sufficient number of cases to fix a license fee, it says that which shall be adopted as the amount of damages. That is adopting the estimation of the patentee himself as to the amount of the injury.

Mr. WADLEIGH. My friend from Michigan will pardon me for saying that that is the law now.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. That is the law now; I have already so stated heretofore. It is the law now that where the patent is of that class of patents where the patentee must look for his profits to the use of his invention by others, if he has already given licenses in a sufficient number of cases to establish the value of a license fee, that is the amount of his recovery, and that is an adequate recovery, and that is full compensation according to his own estimate in that class of cases. Now, there is another class of cases provided for by this bill, where a sufficient number of sales of licenses have not been made to establish a proper license fee. There it provides that it shall be established from all the evidence in the case, and as applied to any patents where the patentee must get his profit by the use of his invention by others it is perfectly just and equitable, and is a fair and just compensation; but as to another class of cases where it is to the interest of the patentee that it should not be used by any other persons but himself, then it would not be; and, as I have already indicated, I should like this bill much better if it provided for that class of cases and gave profits. I think, therefore, that the bill as it now stands, with the exception of that single class of cases, is right in principle and gives just and adequate compensation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Now let the other amendments be read in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is moved to strike out, in section 2, lines 36, 37, 38, 39, and 40, to the word "aforesaid," inclusive, and in lieu thereof to insert:

In taking an account of profits for the use of an invention secured by a patent where the patentee or his assignee shall elect to demand profits, the whole, or such portion of the actual profit or saving derived from such use shall be allowed to the patentee or his assignee, as the court may deem just, in order to secure a fair compensation for such use, having regard to what would be a fair royalty therefor in view of the skill exhibited in making such invention, and the value thereof to the parties using the same, and to all the circumstances of the case; and the master, in taking and stating such account, after stating the amount of profit or saving actually made by such use, shall give and state what portion thereof would, in his judgment, be such fair compensation as aforesaid, to be subject, however, to the modification and judgment of the court. But when a patentee or his assignee shall elect to demand an account of profits against any person, for an infringement of his patent, he shall not be entitled to recover damages for the same infringement.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 6, noes 23; no quorum voting.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I give it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No; I do not withdraw the amendment. I want it to remain. I do not want, in the present temper of the Senate, to do anything discourteous; but I want the amendment to be voted upon. I do not want to withdraw it because I believe it is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no quorum voting.

Several SENATORS. Yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not care about the yeas and nays. I think there is a quorum here if everybody will get up. Let there be a recount

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again submit the question to the Senate.

The amendment was rejected; there being on another division—ayes 10, noes 29.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is one more amendment of the Senator from Illinois, which will be read.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have no further amendment to the second section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is to the third section.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. But there may be some other amendments to the second section; but if none be offered, I move now to add to the third section:

Provided, however, Where an appeal is allowed from an interlocutory decree establishing the validity of a patent or its infringement, the complainant may be permitted, in the discretion of the court, to go on and take his account, subject to payment of costs and counsel fees, if the decree is reversed, and on giving security therefor.

I put it in the imperative originally, "shall be permitted." At the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, I have altered it to "may be permitted in the discretion of the court." After a decree is rendered in the circuit court, and the case is appealed to the Supreme Court, it is there for three years. During that time, as the law now stands, there is nothing done at all. It is advisable I think that the complainant, at his own peril, should be permitted to go on and take his account.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois proposes to amend the third section by an amendment which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is moved to add to the third section of the bill the following words:

Provided, however, Where an appeal is allowed from an interlocutory decree establishing the validity of a patent or its infringement, the complainant may be permitted, in the discretion of the court, to go on and take his account, subject to payment of costs and counsel fees, if the decree is reversed, and on giving security therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move an amendment to section 7, which was intended by the committee to be in the bill originally but was accidentally omitted. I have shown it to all the members of the committee and have the assent of all the members of the committee who are here to offer it.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 7 by adding thereto the following:

And whenever a patent has been issued to two or more persons jointly, describing or representing matter which was of the invention of only one of them, and for which the inventor thereof might lawfully have taken a separate patent to himself, said invention may be secured to the first inventor thereof by reissue of the patent so jointly issued, upon proceedings had as in other cases of reissue, and with the consent in writing of the assignees, if any, of such original patent.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire whether this provision is to be retroactive, and if retroactive there may be something in the amendment which answers my questions what is to become of those who have vested rights?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the vested rights are all thoroughly saved, because it is only to be by consent of all parties in interest.

Mr. CONKLING. Perhaps the Senator himself if he can do so will read the amendment. I have not yet been able to hear it just as it is meant to be.

Mr. HOAR. The original section provides that where a patent has been issued to one person for an invention actually made by him jointly with another, or a patent has been issued to several persons for an invention made by only one, a reissue may correct that error. In other words, the same principle which now is applied in the existing patent law of correcting mistakes in the descriptions of the invention by a reissue is applied to the correction of mistakes in the description of the owner. That is, where a patent has been issued by mistake jointly where it belongs to one, or issued by mistake severally where it belongs to two or more, the reissue may correct the error.

That is the original section. Now the amendment is this:

And whenever a patent has been issued to two or more persons jointly, describing or representing matter which was of the invention of only one of them, and for which the inventor thereof might lawfully have taken a separate patent to himself, said invention may be secured to the first inventor thereof by reissue of the patent so jointly issued, upon proceedings had as in other cases of reissue, and with the consent in writing of the assignees, if any, of such original patent.

That is the whole of it.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Massachusetts may be right in saying that the latter words he reads cover the case of vested rights. Without his assertion I should not be able to say that they do provide for assignees; but certainly assignees are not the only persons who may intervene; and I take it the Senator does not mean by a statute which shall speak backward to change the rights of any person whose rights have become fixed. And in this same connection I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, who seems to be regarding this seventh section, to which his amendment as printed applies, to line 4, which seems to be a very inapt line to effectuate his meaning:

Or a patent has been issued to several persons for an invention made by only one or more of them.

Surely that is not what the committee means.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Whenever it is in order I propose to ask the consent of the Senate to amend what is evidently a verbal inaccuracy, and it should be amended as the Senator from New York suggests.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the amendment, if the Senator pleases?

Mr. WADLEIGH. To insert after the word "person," in the second line of the seventh section, the words "as sole inventor;" to insert after the word "persons," in the third line, the words "as joint inventors;" and to insert after the word "invention," in the fourth line, the word "not;" and after the word "by," in the fourth line, the words "all of said persons jointly;" so that the section as amended will read:

Whenever a patent has been issued to one person as sole inventor for an invention actually made by him jointly with another or others, or a patent has been issued to several persons as joint inventors for an invention not made by all of said persons jointly, &c.

There can be no objection whatever to that verbal correction.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me we are passing away from the first point which is made by the Senator from New York, and perhaps it would be more convenient to him and the Senate to deal with that and settle it in the first place.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not mean to divert attention from the point at which the Senator from Massachusetts was aiming; but as a remark has been made about this, I wish to say that if the four amendments, for there are four of them, indicated by the Senator from New Hampshire were introduced, it might be that the difficulty I suggested, save in one respect, would be cured. The criticism that occurred to me upon the language, (and I commend it to the Senator from New Hampshire,) is that the premises stated are not those from which any error might be inferred at all in such an issue as is supposed; and yet his proposed amendments assume that every such case as the section describes would be the case of error. I do not so understand it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the case provided for by this amendment which I have moved is a case where the original patent would be void without a reissue, and therefore where, strictly speaking, there can be no rights under it to preserve; but at the same time the section undertakes to provide that where there is an assignee in writing of the original incorrect or void patent, who, of course, is an assignee of the party who gains the reissue, he ought to have his own making good of the patent to him inure to the benefit of his assignee; and in that point of view the criticism made by the Senator from New York is a just one, and should be yielded to, that to merely describe the assignee does not cover all parties in interest, and the language should be extended by using these words, "with the consent, in writing, of the assignees, if any, of such original patents, such reissue to inure to the benefit of all parties lawfully claiming under the original patent as if their claim had arisen under the patent so reissued," or some phrase of that sort.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the idea I had.

Mr. HOAR. I will put that in writing, and move it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. While the Senator is putting that in writing, I wish to suggest that this is an interesting and important point in this bill, and according to something that I said yesterday, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Vermont allow this amendment to get in before he makes the motion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may get in and be printed.

Mr. HOAR. Why not take the vote on it? Nobody objects to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Because we cannot tell in a moment what may be the full effect of it. I want to look at it myself. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 9, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Let us have a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are the yeas and nays demanded?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not demand anything; there does not seem to be a quorum here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and forty-seven Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I understand that nobody has yet moved to adjourn over until Monday; an important amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is not in print, and I appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire to let this matter go over until to-morrow, when we shall have a sitting to finish the bill, with the understanding that it shall be finished.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is one that nobody can object to, and it is to a section that there is no objection to on the part of any one, as I understand. I trust the Senate will go on with this bill. It has been long before the Senate, and it seems to me from what I know of it that we can soon finish it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont withdraw his motion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the pending motion. I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 15, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I ask the Chair to count the Senate to save time; and I hope my friend from New Hampshire, who is certain to have his bill disposed of to-morrow, will assent to this thing. I think there is a quorum in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will count the Senate.

Mr. EATON. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum present. The motion is not in order. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and forty-four Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EATON. Will the Senator give way for me to make a motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont withdraw his motion?

Mr. CONKLING. He does not have to withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope, if we do not finish this patent bill, we shall not adjourn over, but shall sit to-morrow.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope we shall adjourn over. If we cannot finish the bill to-day, we shall not be able to do so to-morrow, and there is no use of coming here to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. I fear we shall never finish it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON.]

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the seventh section of the bill.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the fifth section——

Mr. CONKLING. Before that amendment is read, will the Senator let me inquire what amendment it was which the Senate adopted a moment ago?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. CONKLING. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts as offered at first, or as afterward modified?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As modified by him.

Mr. CONKLING. May we hear it read? It never has been read as modified.

Mr. HOAR. I hope no advantage will be taken of declaring that vote in the confusion.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not know that I shall have any objection to it; but I want to know for information what we have adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as adopted.

The SECRETARY. The amendment was to add to section 7:

And whenever a patent has been issued to two or more persons jointly, describing or representing matter which was of the invention of only one of them, and for which the inventor thereof might lawfully have taken a separate patent to himself, said invention may be secured to the first inventor thereof by reissue of the patent so jointly issued, upon proceedings had as in other cases of reissue, and with the consent in writing of the assignees, if any, of such original patent; such reissue to inure to the benefit of all persons claiming under the original patent as if their claims had arisen under the patent so reissued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, I should be glad to have the Senator from Massachusetts tell us what is the necessity for this provision in view of the existing law?

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the existing law does not permit the reissue of a patent which has been issued to two persons in the name of one, or the reverse. That is the necessity for it. Does the Senator from Vermont understand otherwise?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand anything about it. I only want to understand precisely what this thing means.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the patent law at present to permit in case of a defective claim, a defective statement of the invention by reason of claiming more than the party is the original inventor of, or by reason of claiming less than the party is the original inventor of, to be amended by a reissue which may give the party a good monopoly to the time when the original patent would have expired; but there is no provision in the existing patent law for the case where the defect is in the allegation of invention, that is, where the invention is the invention of one and is described wrongly as the invention of two, or where the invention is the invention of two jointly and is described wrongfully as the invention of one. The section as originally drawn cures one of these evils, and this amendment is intended to cure the other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but does my honorable friend from Massachusetts understand that it would invalidate a patent issued in the way he describes because it turned out that the invention was an invention of two instead of one?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir, I do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then under this provision, supposing that to be the law, which I of course am entirely ignorant about, and certainly would not put my opinion against my honorable friend from Massachusetts——

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator not to put too much reliance upon mine.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not mean to put too much.

Mr. HOAR. This amendment was drawn, I will say, by one of the most distinguished patent lawyers in the country to cure this evil, and I have no doubt he knows all about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can see force in the case as the Senator from Massachusetts states it, but I am afraid, I have a suspicion, for I want to state it very mildly, that under this provision you might get a patent on the books issued for an invention of one man who had not got his patent, nor undertaken to get it, within the time, (one that had gone into public use, and therefore one in respect of which he had lost and justly lost all his rights,) and under this form of reissue in the name of another man you will have covered that and scooped into this monopoly a provision of security that ought not to exist.

Mr. HOAR. How is that possible? If the Senator from Vermont will pardon me, let me ask what must have happened to have this clause apply? The Senator from Vermont and somebody with whom he compares notes and acts in inventions jointly, invent an improvement. A patent is taken out on the application of one of them as his work, his invention, and thereupon it runs some time. He undertakes to establish it in court by a suit, and the defense is set up, or at any rate he goes to a lawyer and finds that it could be successfully defended against on the ground, that he was not the original and sole inventor, in the language of the patent law, but that he and somebody else invented it, or the reverse, whichever the case might be. Thereupon he goes to the office, and having had all the time a patent declaring him to be the original and sole inventor he says, "Mr. A B should be associated with me and I want a patent to run for the rest of the time that is unexpired," stating it correctly. Can that possibly be the instrument of any fraud, or can it enable the Senator from Vermont to secure to himself something which the public have been using without claim or pretense of ownership on his part for a series of years?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The fundamental theory of the patent law has always been just as the specific letter of the Constitution is, that a patent is to secure to the discoverer—I believe that is the word of the Constitution—the exclusive right to what he has discovered; and it has always been an essential point, as I understand it, with great respect to my honorable friend, in the fundamental justice of the patent law, that the patent should be granted to the man who made the discovery and not to anybody else. Now, then, if you undertake by this first step in legislation of this character to say that a patent which has been issued to one man may one year or two years or ten years afterward be reissued to another, whether that other man is to have it independently or jointly with the patentee, then I say you do open the door to great danger of fraud and of injustice to the public.

The bill is not altogether satisfactory to my mind as it stands, but if it were to have any one feature of danger that is greater than another, of litigation and trouble and abuse, I am very much afraid it would be this provision.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; if the Senator will pardon me, I will go on.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator would like to hear the point I wished to present to him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Probably I should; only I must say now what I have to say, or I shall forget it. The difficulty under which I am laboring at this moment is the circumstance that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is in manuscript, modified or changed once or twice, and merely hearing it read at the desk, very likely I see difficulties that do not exist. Perhaps the difficulties do exist. The suitable thing in an important matter of this kind is to have it where the eye can run over it and reflect upon it a moment or two. Perhaps I am entirely wrong; but I want to put in a caveat, as they say in the patent law, so that if we turn the world upside down by all sorts of lawsuits and squabbles people have got into through this business, it will not be through any fault of mine.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Vermont, if he will permit me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. I inquire whether he understands that the purpose of my amendment is to permit an issue to anybody not the true inventor?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not understand that that is the purpose of it.

Mr. HOAR. And does the Senator mean by his suggestion to intimate an opinion that the present policy of the patent law, the ancient policy of the patent law, permitting a reissue in case of defective description, is an unwise or dangerous one; because this amendment and the section which is to be amended design to extend the provision which permits a reissue to cure a mistake in the description of the invention, also to cure a mistake in the ownership of the invention, and to make a true allegation where the patent was void because the allegation was false?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The answer to that is that a mistake in ownership is a mistake that has no right to have occurred. It is impossible that any honest man one time in ten millions can have supposed himself to be the inventor of a particular thing unless he was, unless there had been a prior invention of somebody with whom he had no connection and about whom he knew nothing; and if so his patent of course would go for nothing. Therefore this provision is to cure up, in favor of an inventor whose invention has gone into public use and who has not obtained a patent, his rights and monopolies by issuing a patent that will cure his invention as well as that of his friend and neighbor or partner, or whoever he may be.

As I say, so that my friend from Massachusetts will not misunderstand me, I am speaking of this thing off-hand. I only heard the amendment read at the desk; and I cannot tell with any certainty satisfactorily to my own mind whether the amendment on a careful scrutiny and study would be right or wrong. I only want to say that we are dealing with important interests in a very sudden way by making a provision of this kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been some modification of the amendment, and the Chair will have it read before putting the question to the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senate is to vote upon the amendment, or whether so or not, I venture to make one, possibly two suggestions. As a mode of making my suggestion I read the latter words in manuscript of the amendment:

> Such reissue to inure to the benefit of all persons claiming under the original patent as if their claim had arisen under the patent so reissued.

I think there are two classes of cases which this amendment forgets. I feel quite sure there is one class. I will state that of which I have the most doubt first. A man claiming under a patent in some form as it was originally, received his rights, whatever they were, ten years ago. The time when he received them may be of the essence of those rights. This provides that his rights, after this act takes effect and after a reissue has occurred, shall be as if they obtained under that reissued patent. I am inclined to think that a good many cases which with a little reflection might be stated would be ignored by a provision of that kind.

But I come now to the second class of cases, of which I feel more sure. The Senator from Massachusetts says that a patent issued to one man for an invention conceived by two would be void. I will take such a case. A patent was issued ten years ago. Attempts have been made in the courts to enforce it. Issues are pending to test the validity of the patent. This bill becomes a statute. A reissue takes place, and now, if I understand these words, as the tree has fallen so must it lie, and everybody's rights concerned must be as if they had inured under the reissued patent. In other words, if I apprehend it, the defense, the chief defense, perhaps the solitary defense, set up by men who have already become liable for costs and counsel fees and so on, rests upon a fact which under this amendment would cease to be. Is not that so?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from New York will pardon me. His argument applies to the existing law in regard to all reissues. The point he is now making, if I understand him, is not confined to "the extension of the law by this amendment," but applies to the whole reissue policy. That point, which is a good one we suppose, is largely covered by the sixth section:

> No machine or other article made prior to the surrender of a patent, and the issue thereupon of a new patent, which, or the use of which, did not infringe such surrendered patent, shall be held to be an infringement of any of the claims of the new patent not existing when such machine or other article was made. All rights of action accruing to a patentee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, for profits and damages on account of any infringement of a patent, prior to its surrender for a reissue, shall remain unaffected by such surrender, and no suit shall be barred or abated by such surrender.

Mr. CONKLING. The words "prior to the surrender," if the Senator will pardon me, are not in the print which I have, and which is the latest print of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. There may be a later print than the copy I have. I am reading the sixth section.

Mr. CONKLING. What line?

Mr. HOAR. What I read begins at the first of the section:

> No machine or other article made prior to the surrender of a patent, and the issue thereupon of a new patent, which, or the use of which, did not infringe such surrendered patent, shall be held to be an infringement of any of the claims of the new patent not existing when such machine or other article was made.

Mr. CONKLING. That is here; but the Senator read it the first time "all rights of action accruing to a patentee, &c., prior to the surrender." That is not in my bill.

Mr. HOAR. It is on the ninth line. I believe the two sections are identical in the print I read from and the other print.

Mr. CONKLING. It is possible that I misheard the Senator or he misread. I understood him to read:

All rights of action accruing to a patentee prior to the surrender.

Mr. HOAR. I read the language of the bill, as follows:

All rights of action accruing to a patentee * * * for profits and damages on account of any infringement of a patent prior to its surrender for a reissue, shall remain unaffected by such surrender.

I so read, and it is so in this copy of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator does not apprehend me, or I him. I understood him to read:

All rights of action accruing to a patentee prior to the surrender.

The bill that I have reads:

All rights of action accruing to a patentee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, for profits and damages on account of any infringement of a patent, prior to its surrender for a reissue.

The difference between the two things is very marked. It is not typographical at all, but it is very substantial.

Mr. HOAR. I will send to the Senator from New York the two copies of the bill which I now have. If he has a third print I do not know what it is.

Mr. CONKLING. I read mine as it is. I do not know whether it is a third or second print. [Examining the bills.] Mine resembles one of the copies the Senator sends and does not resemble the other.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is mistaken; the two copies are identical.

Mr. CONKLING. They are not identical as to the paging and lines certainly.

Mr. HOAR. No, they are not identical as to the paging.

Mr. CONKLING. Or the lines.

Mr. HOAR. Or the lines; but the sections are identical in language, without any question.

Mr. CONKLING. That may be. I do not think that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts apprehends the point I stated altogether, and if he does not I assume that it is my fault. The suggestion I seek to make is that under this amendment the rights of all parties will become triable as if the original patent had been like the reissued patent, and as if the date of that patent had been as of the reissued date, so that a man who is defending upon the prior patent may be entirely cast and overthrown in his defense by this section. If it has that effect, I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts means that.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the sixth section makes a general provision on that subject, covering all reissues.

Mr. CONKLING. Does it make a general provision in a case of this sort? Here is a suit in equity which has been pending for five years, and there are a great many such, and one chief ground of defect is vice in the issue of the original patent. The Senator's amendment declares that the patent may be reissued, and when reissued, that the rights of all persons claiming under the original patent shall be as if they claimed under the reissued patent. Does not that retroact and deprive the party defending of the defense which he sets up?

Mr. HOAR. It is easier, Mr. President, to meet the objection taken by the Senator from New York, which is based on a misunderstanding of the operation of the bill, by providing language which shall remove doubt, if there is any doubt of the meaning. It is very clear, of course, that it would not be just that a reissue should affect the rights of persons who are contesting with the owner of the original patent in any particular.

Mr. CONKLING. At that point I ask the Senator, if he will allow me, to read the latter words of the amendment and give us his opinion whether they are not open to the criticism I state.

Mr. HOAR. The language of my amendment is that such reissue shall "inure to the benefit of all persons claiming under the original patent as if their claim had arisen under the patent so reissued." But I do not think that would be construed to repeal an express section which still stands in the law, that in all cases of reissues a machine shall not be held to be an infringement of the new patent if it was not an infringement of the old. The two would stand together.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me, what becomes of the costs, for example in pending cases, under that theory now of construing the sixth and seventh sections?

Mr. HOAR. Pending cases would be decided both as to damages and costs and in judgment, in all respects as if the reissue had not taken place.

Mr. CONKLING. I should not want to defend a man on that theory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as modified.

Mr. HOAR. I will modify the amendment further by adding the words "except as provided in the sixth section."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts modifies the amendment. As modified it will be reported by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 7 by adding thereto the following:

And whenever a patent has been issued to two or more persons jointly, describing or representing matter which was of the invention of only one of them, and for which the inventor thereof might lawfully have taken a separate patent to himself, said invention may be secured to the first inventor thereof by reissue of the patent so jointly issued, upon proceedings had as in other cases of reissue, and with the consent in writing of the assignees, if any, of such original patent; such reissue to inure to the benefit of all persons claiming under the original patent as if their claim had arisen under the patent so reissued, except as provided in the sixth section.

The question being put on the amendment, there were on a division—ayes 9, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not until we get a quorum.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to amend the seventh section of the bill, on which no quorum voted. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and forty-six Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

The question being again put upon the amendment, a division was called for; and the ayes were 21——

Mr. WADLEIGH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 8; as follows:

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I do not like to trouble the Senate when it is weary, and from the temper manifested in relation to this bill I can see the fate of my amendment; but I conceive it to be my duty to present it. It is an amendment to the fifth section, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 5 the following proviso:

Provided, That it shall not be lawful to grant any reissue of any patent for any invention, except the invention which was embraced in the original patent.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire, in his speech the other day, enumerated the particulars in which the new section relating to reissues is an improvement on the old. The substance of it all is that in granting a reissue the Commissioner is to be confined to "the papers filed in the office before the original patent issued"—"without resort to the model,"—and it is implied that the reissue may be granted for all that might have been patented on the first application upon the said original papers, for the court is directed to inquire whether it is for anything except "the same invention, shown, contained, or substantially indicated in the specification or drawings of the original application and its amendments, and which the patentee would have been entitled to include as a part of his invention on the patent originally granted."

The first part, confining the Commissioner to the original papers, is right; although, if the reissue is to be confined to the same invention as that described in the original patent, I can see no harm in referring to the model.

But the effect of the whole section taken together is to allow the Commissioner to go outside of the invention secured or indicated by the original patent and to put into the reissue anything suggested by the original application and papers. This will be productive of great evil.

When an application is made for a patent generally a struggle commences between the applicant and the Patent Office. The applicant wishes his patent to cover everything; the office wishes to restrict it within reasonable bounds, so as not to cover any other patent or anything that has been known or used before.

After much negotiation, contention, and argument the office finally decides what it will allow and the patentee acquiesces. If he does not acquiesce, he has the right to appeal. Say he does not appeal, but acquiesces, is it not evident that what he did not then get allowed to him was decided to be not his? He now waits for eight or ten years until there is another Commissioner or examiner and until the facts known to them are forgotten, and then goes to the Patent Office for a reissue. The present officials knowing nothing of what has transpired except what correspondence may be on file, grants all he wants, for it is all covered by his original papers. Thus he gets the original decision of the Commissioner reversed without an appeal; or rather, his new application (for reissue) serves him as an appeal from the first decision. In this way some of the most unjust reissues have been granted.

Again, after a patent has been issued the public are free to occupy the ground not covered by it, and confiding in the action of the Patent Office which has confined the patentee to a certain invention, described or indicated, in his patent, capital is often expended to a large amount for the purpose of using that which is not patented. If a reissue can reverse all this, great injustice is done throughout the community. Whereas, if the patentee, desiring to claim some invention indicated in his first papers and not being part of the invention which was patented, is obliged to make a new original application, he is then subjected to all the rules and defenses which his delay and the public use create. The public thus has some protection.

To obviate these difficulties, the courts have decided, under the present law, which only authorizes a reissue for "the same invention," that a reissue can only be granted for the same invention which is patented, or attempted to be patented, in the original patent, and not for a different thing, although mentioned or alluded to in the original papers. If he wants to patent such different thing, he must make a new and original application, and be subject to all the defenses that time and public use may have created in the mean time.

This was clearly illustrated in a late case (the nitro-glycerine and giant powder case) decided at the present term of the Supreme Court, in which Mr. Justice Bradley wrote the opinion.

There a German by the name of Noble applied for a patent for several things, among others, first, for a process of exploding nitro-glycerine by detonation in contact with it while in a confined state; second, for a new compound of nitro-glycerine with gunpowder and other substances. A patent was issued to him for the process only. He afterward surrendered this patent (after some years) and got a reissue for both inventions. The court held that reissue to be void, not being authorized by the statute. Even as the law now stands great abuses are brought about by reissues; but if the discretion of the Commissioner is enlarged, so as to empower him to grant reissues for invention not included in the original patent, the way would be open for much greater abuses still. This feature of the proposed new section, which while it seems to restrict the Commissioner's power actually enlarges it, seems to me very objectionable. The section ought at least to have a proviso confining the power to grant reissues within the same bounds that now exist. Something like the following would answer the purpose:

Provided, That it shall not be lawful to grant any reissue of any patent for any invention, except the invention which was embraced in the original patent.

In the argument of the nitro-glycerine case the counsel of the patentee contended earnestly, under the law as it now stands, for the Commissioner's power to grant a reissue for anything described in the original application. The court decided that he had no such power, for that would be to take up the case anew, and grant what has been refused by the former Commissioner or waived by the patentee. The privilege of having a reissue is intended to correct mistakes or inadvertences, not to revise the action of the former Commissioner or the former action of the same Commissioner. To allow this to be done would, as I have remarked, introduce great evils, which none but a person practically acquainted with the subject can adequately appreciate. The section, in my judgment, has the effect to open this door to abuses. It seems to impose restraints, but it actually enlarges the powers of the Commissioner.

It does this by implication. It says that the reissue shall not contain anything that was not described or indicated in the original application or amendments or correspondence, which by a negative pregnant means that it may contain anything that was described or suggested in the original papers. This ought not to be allowed. The reissue ought to be confined to the same invention which was included in the original patent. Whoever wishes to protect the public against the flagrant abuses of the patent law should, I think, contend earnestly for this principle.

Mr. WADLEIGH. May I ask the Senator from Illinois wherein the present bill enlarges the old law?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have just stated it.

Mr. WADLEIGH. In what part of a particular section?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. As I have just stated, the bill provides that the reissue shall not contain anything that was not described or indicated in the original application, or amendments, or correspondence, which by a negative pregnant means that it may contain anything that was described or suggested in the original papers. I have said it does it by implication. If you are willing that the reissue shall be confined to the original patent, my amendment does no harm, and it does great good.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, I regret to be again obliged to discuss this bill. The fifth section of the bill is precisely the same as section 4916 of the Revised Statutes except so far as it provides what evidence may be received by the Commissioner upon a reissue.

The provision in section 4916 as to such evidence is as follows:

But no new matter shall be introduced into the specification, nor in case of a machine-patent shall the model or drawings be amended, except each by the other; but when there is neither model nor drawing, amendments may be made upon proof satisfactory to the Commissioner that such new matter or amendment was a part of the original invention, and was omitted from the specification by inadvertence, accident, or mistake, as aforesaid.

The similar provision in the bill is as follows:

But no new matter shall be introduced into the specification not shown, contained, or substantially indicated in the specification or drawings of the original application or its amendments, and which the patentee would have been entitled to include as a part of his invention in the patent originally granted. But no reissue shall be allowed, unless applied for within seven years from the date of the original patent, or within four years from the date of the passage of this act.

All the change that this bill makes in the law is to guard against the frauds that have been perpetrated by allowing parties to obtain reissues upon ex parte affidavits and an examination of models.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. But it is not that point I object to at all. If you are in favor of confining the reissue to the original invention as patented and described, why object to the amendment? It cannot do any harm. I simply want to confine it to that. I do not say this may not be an improvement upon the old law. I am not speaking about that. I am simply saying that I believe, as it is, you can go back and patent anything that was contained in the original papers by a reissue; that is all.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Senator from Illinois will not deny that the bill is an improvement on the law as it now stands, under which enormous frauds have been committed.

Let us look at the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. An inventor presents his claim to the officials of the Patent Office. Now, he cannot take a patent as he claims it; his claim must be clothed in the language that the officials choose. The description which they give of the invention may be so defective as not to give him a valid patent. Under the amendment of my friend the Senator from Illinois I fear he would be prevented from correcting such mistake through a reissue, and would lose his rights without any fault of his own.

Under this bill no injury can happen to the public on account of a reissue, because the sixth section provides that no right of action shall accrue on account of what has been done prior to the reissue, unless there has been an infringement of the patent originally granted. I think it would be wrong to make a patentee liable to lose his rights and be ruined by the mistake of an official in the Patent Office when the papers filed by him, which are open to the world, correctly describe his invention. Therefore I hope the amendment of the Senator from Illinois will not be adopted on that account.

One word more. Under the law as it now stands the Supreme Court, in the case The Giant Powder Company vs. The California Powder Works, decided this point. I read from the syllabus of the decision:

A reissued patent must be for the same invention as that which formed the subject of the original patent; or for part thereof when divisional reissues are granted. It must not contain anything substantially new or different.

The provision in the present law upon which that decision rests is precisely the same as the provision in this bill, and that opinion applies to this bill as well as to the present law. This bill restricts rather than enlarges the power of the Commissioner to grant reissues.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, before we vote on this amendment, I should like to understand by the aid of the Senator from New Hampshire one point at least. I observe that in section 4916 of the Revised Statutes, which this section amends, stand these words:

But no new matter shall be introduced into the specification, nor in case of a machine patent shall the model or drawings be amended, except each by the other.

I ask the Senator and all Senators to turn now to the equivalent words, as far as they are equivalent, proposed in the fifth section:

But no new matter shall be introduced into the specification not shown, contained, or substantially indicated in the specification or drawings of the original application or its amendments.

If I understand this aright no man now can amplify his patent by a reissue beyond this possibility:

No new matter shall be introduced into the specification, nor in case of a machine patent shall the model or drawings be amended, except each by the other.

That is sufficiently definite to have enabled the court in the nitro-glycerine case referred to by the Senator from Illinois to hold that the party who made originally two claims, as they are called, and had one decided against him and received a patent for the other could not in a new patent cover both those claims. That is what the court held. So the court has held in other cases. That was one of the great struggles in the India-rubber case. Under this proposed section see what a party may do. He may obtain a reissued patent for anything which was shown by his original application and specification, anything which was contained in the original specification, and for something I think very much more, to wit, for anything "substantially indicated."

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Indicated!" Is that the word?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly, "substantially indicated;" and the Senator from Vermont very naturally calls attention to that word, upon which, in one moment, I am going to dwell. "Or substantially indicated." "Indicated" where? Indicated either in the specification or in the drawings of the original application or in any of its amendments. What does "indicated" mean? It means "denoted," does it not? It does not necessarily mean "described," "fully specified and clearly presented," but anything indicated; and, industriously enough, the draughtsman of this section has used the prefix "substantially." So that, it is not necessary that it should even be indicated in any literal or full sense, but "substantially indicated," which as it seems to me would be the synonymous term with "it is substantially denoted," "it is pointed out," "it is adverted to." I confess frankly that my attention had not been called to those words until I heard the Senator from Illinois point them out, and I think it will be manifest on reading, as I have done, with some care, section 4916, and reading this language, and assuming that this is the part of the section which describes the evidence on which the Commissioner may act, and so the chairman of the committee tells us, that this does bring in new and wider elements of judgment than the present law.

As I understand the decisions of the courts, they are in many instances that a patent may not issue for the very things which were substantially indicated, which were more than substantially indicated, which were exactly indicated; as, for example, in the case referred to by the Senator from Illinois, a claimant comes and says, "I have a process by which I can explode dynamite and gunpowder mixed together, and I can do it by detonation. That is my first claim. I claim, second, a new process, a new compound. I claim a patent for a method of commingling nitro-glycerine with certain other substances, so as to give greater explosive force or greater economy or advantage of some kind in the use of this new compound." The Commissioner says, "Claim No. 1 is allowed; I issue a patent for that." Manifestly claim No. 2 was substantially indicated, and yet the courts say that a reissued patent embracing also claim No. 2 is void, void at all events pro hac vice, or, more accurately speaking, void pro tanto, void as to the new claim, although it was substantially and clearly indicated. Here comes a section which by way of express authority, as I understand it, enables the Commissioner of Patents to take up this very case and grant a reissued patent, not only for claim No. 1, but for claim No. 2, and not only so but for anything else which was substantially indicated either in the specification or in the drawings, if the invention was mechanical, or in either of the amendments found in the Patent Office and filed to the specification.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Will the Senator from New York allow me to ask him if he has ever read the case of Seymour vs. Osborne, in 11 Wallace, where the court expounded this?

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will let me see the head-note I will tell him if I have ever read it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, everybody knows about Seymour vs. Osborne, I think.

Mr. CONKLING, (examining 11 Wallace's Reports.) Yes, sir; I have read this case; but I do not know the particular point in this very copious syllabus to which the Senator from New Hampshire calls my attention.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Before the Senator closes I will call his attention to it.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator be kind enough to direct my attention now to the point of the case he refers to?

Mr. WADLEIGH. Yes, I will. I propose to state it, and then the Senator can proceed if he desires, if the Senator will now give me the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly, I will give the Senator the floor. I will be very glad to have him give me any information I am seeking.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The position taken by the Senator from Illinois and by the Senator from New York is that the present bill so changes the law as to enlarge the rights of the patentee in respect to reissues. It is true that in the case to which my friend the Senator from New York refers, (Giant Powder Company vs. The California Powder Works,) the court decided that under the law as it now stands a patent could not be reissued containing an invention not contained in the original patent; but that the reissued patent must be for the same invention. But that decision rests upon the provision contained in the present law and also in the bill—that the Commissioner may "cause a new patent for the same invention" to be issued. It is under that clause, which is precisely the same in this bill as in the present law, that the court in that case decided that the reissued patent must contain the same invention and no other than that contained in the original patent. As to the evidence which the Commissioner shall receive upon the reissue of a patent, the Supreme Court, in the case of Seymour vs. Osborne, decided that precisely the same evidence that this bill provides for shall be admitted.

I read from the opinion of the court, page 544, 11 Wallace:

4. That the reissued letters-patent are void and of no effect because they were not granted for the same invention as that embodied in the original letters-patent nor for any invention made by the patentees before the original letters-patent were granted.

Reissued letters-patent must, by the express words of the section authorizing the same, be for the same invention, and consequently where it appears on a comparison of the two instruments, as matter of law, that the reissued patent is not for the same invention as that embraced and secured in the original patent, the reissued patent is invalid, as that state of facts shows that the Commissioner, in granting the new patent, exceeded his jurisdiction. Power is unquestionably conferred upon the Commissioner to allow the specification to be amended if the patent is inoperative or invalid, and in that event to issue the patent in proper form; and he may, doubtless, under that authority, allow the patentee to redescribe his invention and to include in the description and claims of the patent not only what was well described before, but whatever else was suggested or substantially indicated—

The very words of the bill—in the specifications or drawings which properly belonged to the invention as actually made and perfected. Interpolations of new features, ingredients, or devices, which were neither described, suggested, nor indicated in the original patent, or Patent-Office model, are not allowed, as it is clear that the Commissioner has no jurisdiction to grant a reissue unless it be for the same invention as that embodied in the original letters-patent, which necessarily excludes the right on such an application to open the case to new parol testimony and a new hearing as to the nature and extent of the improvement, except in certain special cases, as provided in a recent enactment not applicable to the case before the court.

This bill repeals that "recent enactment" to which the court refers.

Corrections may be made in the description, specification, or claim where the patentee has claimed as new more than he had a right to claim, or where the description, specification, or claim is defective or insufficient, but he cannot under such an application make material additions to the invention which were not described, suggested, nor substantially indicated in the original specifications, drawings, or Patent-Office model.

We have adopted in this bill the precise language used by the court in Seymour vs. Osborne to describe the power of the Commissioner under the existing statute. We limit that power, however, by forbidding any use of models or affidavits as evidence to show what the real invention was, and under this bill the Commissioner can reissue a patent only "for the invention described, suggested, or substantially indicated" in the application or drawings.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York whose affair this is, will pardon me, I wish to call the attention of my friend from New Hampshire to a difference that he does not appear to have observed in his statement. The statement of the Supreme Court is a negation, and it does not therefore follow that on the other hand if in a description there was something denoted or indicated, the man was entitled to a reissue for that. That would depend on a thousand circumstances.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Senators have heard the extracts I read from the opinion in 11 Wallace, and if they will carefully examine the bill before the Senate they will see that it does not change the existing law except to limit the power of the Commissioner by forbidding the use of models or any evidence except that of the written application and drawings. In that opinion the court say that in a reissued patent the patentee "may include in the description and claims of the patent not only what was well described but whatever else was described or substantially indicated."

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if I understand the Senator from New Hampshire aright, he says that the section of the statute as it stands now consists of two members, first a provision which lays down the existence and marks the boundaries within which new patents may be issued, and second a definition, if I may so say, of the evidence on which that reissue may be adjudged. Does the Senator so say?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I was interrupted. Will he repeat his question and I will try to answer it?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it occurs to me that a good many of us are interrupted during the consideration of this patent bill in times when if we were not interrupted it is just possible we might understand it better. However——

Mr. WADLEIGH. But the Senator from New York has a way of cross-examining Senators for which they may not be entirely prepared. I will try to answer his question.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will say that, I will forbear to cross-examine him or to examine him at all.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not ask the Senator to forbear because I will try to answer to the best of my ability.

Mr. CONKLING. I was endeavoring to understand the Senator from New Hampshire, who thinks he has read a decision of the Supreme Court vindicating this section. If he has he has contributed a very valuable piece of evidence. I understood him to say that the section of the Revised Statutes now in existence consists of two members; first, it lays down the rule, or prescribes the instances within which reissues may take place, and, second, it indicates the evidence on which the Commissioner may act. Am I right so far, if the Senator will not deem it a cross-examination? I do not comprehend whether the Senator authorizes me so to understand or not.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I nodded, and I supposed that signified assent in all civilized countries.

Mr. CONKLING. Undoubtedly the Senate should take notice whenever the Senator from New Hampshire nods; but as I asked him a question, and as he is of age and abundantly able to speak for himself, I thought it very likely he would tell me whether I was right or not.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I will say that in my judgment the Senator from New York has correctly stated.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, assuming, then, that that is the present state of the statute, I want the Senator from New Hampshire to inform the Senate, if he will, why he has amplified the statute in respect of the evidence the Commissioner may receive. He has certainly done that according to his own statement, because he has interpolated or imported into the section all that he says the Supreme Court declares the Commissioner may act upon. Now, if he wants to restrict it why does he multiply the evidence on which the Commissioner may act? Certainly he does not do it to narrow the effect of the section.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Well, I will answer that under the old law the Commissioner had the right upon a reissue not only to refer to the specification or drawings and the application or its amendments, but also to the model, and in addition to that he had the right to receive ex parte affidavits, and that under the clause which is "upon proof satisfactory to the Commissioner," and that led to fraud in reissues.

Mr. CONKLING. But if my friend will pardon me, he has read the part of the section to which I do not refer and has omitted these words to which I want pointedly to refer:

But no new matter shall be introduced into the specification.

I stop there. "But no new matter shall be introduced into the specification." That is tolerably plain-spoken. We all know what that is.

Nor in case of a machine patent shall the model or drawings be amended, except each by the other.

If they are variant they may be compared and corrected, but nothing shall be added to them and no new matter shall be introduced. Now, what does the Senator propose here in the place of that? He proposes to say:

But no new matter shall be introduced into the specification not shown, contained, or substantially indicated in the specification or drawings of the original application or its amendments, and which the patentee would have been entitled to include as a part of his invention in the patent originally granted.

Can any lawyer or layman listen to those words and suppose that they do not amplify these words: "but no new matter shall be introduced," no matter what? And yet the Senator tells us, as I understand him, that dealing with a section the first part of which prescribes the case in which the Commissioner may act and the second part of which points out the evidence and all of it on which he may act, he is going to narrow the administration of that section by multiplying the kinds of evidence and bringing in new elements on which he may act?

I understand the Supreme Court to have said that under this section of the Revised Statutes, as it stands now, narrower as I think than the proposed provision, certain things cannot be done, and I understand the court in referring to what may be done to say that as to that there must be a substantial indication of the meaning of the party; and now the Senator proposes, as I understand it, to so change this section that, not only as to that one specific thing which may be under the present statutes within the power of the Commissioner, but as to any other thing which may be substantially indicated, he may propose to reissue a patent or to issue a new patent, and I think the Senator from Illinois asks with great force the Senator from New Hampshire why it is, if his purpose be as he indicates, that he objects to an amendment in three or four lines which says so. The amendment says as the Supreme Court has said that there shall be no patent reissued for an invention not covered by the first patent. If the Senator from New Hampshire means the same thing why does he not adopt the amendment? It can do no harm; it is simply for abundant caution. It merely puts in the letter of the statute what he says is to be its spirit now.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I think the Senator from New York misunderstood the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not think the Senator from New Hampshire will say that this section, if passed without my amendment, does not authorize the Commissioner of Patents to reissue for anything that was contained in the original application and papers.

Mr. CONKLING. He does say so. He says that it only authorizes the Commissioner to do that which the Supreme Court in the Seymour case in 11 Wallace said he could do.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Is the Senator from New Hampshire in favor of my construction? That is the point.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I am in favor of the decision in Seymour vs. Osborne, in 11 Wallace, which has never been overruled nor criticised in any way by anybody till now; and that is this:

Power is unquestionably conferred upon the Commissioner to allow the specification to be amended if the patent is inoperative or invalid, and in that event to issue the patent in proper form; and he may doubtless, under that authority, allow the patentee to redescribe his invention and to include in the description and claims of the patent not only what was well described before, but whatever else was suggested or substantially indicated in the specification or drawings which properly belonged to the invention as actually made and perfected.

This bill does not go beyond that one hair's breadth, and I ask the Senator from Illinois if it does.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I think where two patents are applied for, one for a process and one for a combination, this bill, under its provisions as to evidence, authorizes a reissue for both.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I ask the Senator from Illinois whether or not this bill goes beyond what I have read from the decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is not the question. This section is very astutely drawn, and what earthly objection is there to inserting the few words I propose, that a reissue shall cover nothing more than was covered by the original patent? If the object of the committee is to confine it to that, what objection is there to this? A statute has to be construed by a court; the minds of men do not agree about these things. An appellate tribunal may differ from us about the particular construction of a patent. I am for the interest of the great public in this matter, that no man who has obtained a patent, resting satisfied with it without taking an appeal, having waived all objection to the decision of the Patent Commissioner, shall after eight or ten years come forward and by referring to the original papers on file get a reissue for more than his patent originally embraced.

I want the Senator to say distinctly whether that ought not to be done? If so, do not these words make the section plainer? What is the use of looking to see whether there is a discrepancy between the decisions of the Supreme Court on that subject? If the Giant Powder case is the last one be it so; but I do not know whether in Seymour vs. Osborne the court would have decided as they have done in the case of the Giant Powder Company. Time makes men a great deal wiser, and it was a great many years ago that Seymour vs. Osborne was decided. Now, why not incorporate here the simple words of my amendment?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Senator from Illinois made an accusation against this bill which the Senator from New York indorsed, that it enlarged the operation of the present law. The decision in Seymour vs. Osborne shows that under the old law the Commissioner had precisely the power this bill gives him. The Senator from Illinois asks why I object to his amendment. Because, sir, I fear that if it is adopted honest patentees who have defectively but substantially described their inventions or who have accepted erroneous descriptions from the officials in the Patent Office will lose their rights. I fear that his amendment will be so construed as to prevent the Commissioner from reissuing a patent for the invention described, or substantially indicated in the original application and drawings of the patentee, because some official of the Government may have made a mistake.

Under this bill no new matter can be introduced upon a reissue, to show what the invention was. New matter is something not "described, suggested, nor substantially indicated" in the papers originally filed by the patentee. What is thus described, suggested, or substantially indicated may now be introduced and that rule laid down by the court in Seymour vs. Osborne is left unchanged by this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I should have no sort of objection to this bill under the recent decision of the Supreme Court if it was an exact transcript of the old law. Reissues now are granted for inadvertence or mistake; and it is very plain that this amendment proposed has no reference to that at all. It hits at the root of the evil. It says that there shall be no reissue except for the thing patented. There may have been a mistake of the Commissioner in the claims set forth in the specification. He may have inadvertently done something in relation to that patent which he should not have done; but when he has granted a patent for a process he is not to turn round and grant a patent for a compound although it was originally applied for. I say under this section that you may get a patent for a compound although the process was the only thing patentable.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The decision to which the Senator from Illinois refers is put expressly on the ground that the patent must be reissued "for the same invention." Now, this bill provides that such reissue must be "for the same invention" exactly as does the present law.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. But my amendment says it shall be for the same invention.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois goes further. It may be so construed as to prevent a patentee from obtaining a reissue on account of a defective description of his invention in his letters-patent, where such defective description results from the mistake of some official, and where the patentee correctly described his invention in his application and drawings.

Mr. CONKLING. The same invention?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The same invention. If the amendment does not have that effect it seems to me to have none, because the provision contained in the present law and in the bill under consideration—that the reissue must be "for the same invention"—has been so construed in Seymour vs. Osborne and in Giant Powder Company vs. California Powder Works as to prevent the reissue for another invention than that already patented, which is all my friend the Senator from Illinois professes to desire.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I introduced the amendment in the interest of the public and common justice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 11; as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No quorum has voted.

Mr. ALLISON. Unless the Senator from New Hampshire specially desires to close this bill to-night, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw it, certainly.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and myself have agreed to withdraw from the committee of investigation on Federal elections South and ask that the Chair fill our places, owing to the absence of the Senator from Delaware and my inability to attend to the duty.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that himself and the Senator from Delaware may withdraw from the investigating committee on the subject of elections. Is there objection?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to make no objection in response to the remark of the Chair; but if I can do so without its being in the nature of an objection, I will say that the rules of the Senate declare that without a quorum no business whatever shall be done, except to adjourn or have a call of the Senate. What the effect might be of the request being granted under such circumstances, the Senator must consider for himself; but unless it is very pressing, I think he had better wait until a quorum is present if he wants to be excused.

Mr. President, unless the Senator wishes to continue the matter now, I will submit a motion that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I ask for a call of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Pending that call, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Pending the call the Senator from New York moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 12, noes 28.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and forty-three Senators answered to their names.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

EXERCISE OF ELECTIVE FRANCHISE COMMITTEE.

Mr. WALLACE. I now renew my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania renews his request that he and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] be excused from further service upon the committee to investigate matters connected with southern elections.

Mr. WALLACE. I may state to the Senate that the reason for this is that the gentlemen who represent the minority of the Senate now at New Orleans are about starting for the North, and the remainder of the committee are charged with the duty of going to Charleston. The Senator from Delaware is absent on important duty, and it is impossible for myself to go. We are therefore compelled to decline service, and to ask the Senate to appoint other members representing the minority.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOAR. I hope that will lie over until Monday until the Senate is full. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. WALLACE. The committee will be at Charleston on Monday and the minority will not be represented.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is objection made to action to-day?

Mr. HOAR. I only made the suggestion.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not object because the committee will be at Charleston on Monday and will be there with the majority of the Senate represented and no representation of the minority at all.

Mr. HOAR. Of course the Senator knows that I would not wish to make an objection on that ground; but the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] and myself who are members of the committee, understanding that the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Delaware were not going to Charleston, had ourselves determined not to go to-day. Now, if those gentlemen withdraw and some new gentlemen of the democratic side should go, it might result in the minority being represented and the majority not being represented. That is all I wish to guard against. I am sure no gentleman on the other side would seek to bring about such a result.

Mr. WALLACE. We had no intention to do anything of the kind.

Mr. HOAR. That was my only reason for objecting; but now, understanding with the Senator from Pennsylvania that some arrangement will be made that the parties on both sides will be represented, I withdraw my objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair then hears no objection; and he appoints to fill the places of the Senators retiring the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] and the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.]

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of citizens of Stillwater, Minnesota, praying the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 4234) granting arrears of pensions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of R. A. Young & Brother, citizens of Petersburgh, Virginia, praying compensation for certain tobacco alleged to have been seized and appropriated by United States military forces at Petersburgh during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Pickrell & Brooks, citizens of Virginia, praying compensation for certain tobacco alleged to have been seized and appropriated by United States military forces during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of J. Cheeves, surviving partner of Cheeves & Osborne, of Virginia, praying compensation for tobacco alleged to have been taken and appropriated by United States military forces during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE LEONARD.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That 8,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the House of Representatives and to be delivered in the Senate upon the late J. E. Leonard, late member of this House from the fifth district of Louisiana, be printed; 6,000 for the use of the House, and 2,000 for the use of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1643) to establish a land district in Watertown, in the Territory of Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 48) providing for the payment of 50 per cent. of the amounts required by law to be withheld from certain railroad companies for transportation service rendered for the Government; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. WITHERS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5218) to establish post-routes herein named; which, with the accompanying petition, was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. PADDOCK, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 3547) to regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers, be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator change that to a motion for an executive session?

Mr. ALLISON. I will if the Senator desires it. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT, (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) The Senate stands adjourned to Monday next at twelve o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 17, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. W. V. TUDOR, of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, Saint Louis, Missouri.

PATENT LAWS.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the board of common councilmen of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, protesting against the passage of Senate bill No. 300 and House bill No. 1612, relating to the patent laws; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

CINCINNATI, January 15, 1879.

SIR: At a meeting of the board of councilmen of the city of Cincinnati, held on the 20th day of December, A. D. 1878, the following was adopted.

[L. S.] RICHARD C. ROHNER, City Clerk.

Hon. H. B. BANNING,
Member of the House of Representatives, Washington City, D. C.

Whereas, representing a constituency generally acknowledged to be one of the leading manufacturing cities of the United States, whose business interests and prosperity are largely founded upon the labors of inventors, we recognize the wisdom and importance of laws protecting inventors and manufacturers in the right of property existing in patented inventions under the Constitution; and

Whereas certain measures known as the Wadleigh bills (Senate bill No. 300 and House bill No. 1612) have been introduced and are pending in the Congress of the United States, which under the guise of amending the patent laws at present existing would tend to deprive inventors and patentees of those rights in inventions which are accorded to holders of other property, and by imposing unnecessary burdens and limitations discourage and repress that creative genius that has distinguished the American people above all other nations and contributed more than all other causes combined to their material prosperity; and

Whereas it is the sense of this body that the passage of such or similar laws would react injuriously upon the constituency and interests we represent: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the city council of Cincinnati, That sections 1, 2, and 3 of the said Wadleigh bill and House bill No. 1612 are unwise, impolitic, and unjust to inventors and manufacturers and tend to discourage invention and impede the progress of the useful arts and sciences, and that our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and are hereby, requested to use all honorable means to defeat the sections of said bills above alluded to.

Resolved, That a copy hereof be transmitted to each of our Senators and Representatives, under the seal of the city.

RESOURCES OF COOS RIVER, OREGON.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon, by unanimous consent, presented a statistical report of the resources of Coos River, in the State of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RETIREMENT OF AN ARMY OFFICER.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5856) for the retirement of an Army officer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN C. BECK.

Mr. BANNING also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5857) for the relief of John C. Beck; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADOLPH VON LUETTWITZ.

Mr. BANNING also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5858) to provide for the retirement of Adolph von Luettwitz, first lieutenant Third Cavalry, United States Army, with the rank and pay of a mounted captain; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS CRARY.

Mr. BEEBE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5859) for the relief of Thomas Crary, postmaster at Parksville, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BREWER. I call for the regular order.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS IN THE CAPITOL.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I rise to a question of privilege, and ask that the Clerk read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Joint Rule No. 19 of the House of Representatives prohibits the sale of intoxicating or malt liquors in the Capitol building of the United States, or within the public grounds adjacent thereto; and

Whereas at the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress this House by resolution expressed its condemnation of the sale of intoxicating or malt liquors in said building or within said grounds and its approval of said joint rule, and instructed the officers of the House to see that said rule be not violated by the keepers of the House restaurant, which action was approved by the honorable Speaker of the House; and

Whereas it is commonly reported that said keepers do not, and have not, respected the said action of the House, but have continued, from the time of the passage of said resolution, to violate Joint Rule 19, and have continued to sell intoxicating liquors in said restaurant,

Now comes the undersigned, and doth charge the present keepers of the House restaurant with violation of said joint rule, and with disregarding the express wishes of the members of this House and defying the law and the honorable Speaker, and with violating the internal-revenue laws of the United States by selling intoxicating liquors in said restaurant without license.

C. C. ELLSWORTH.

Resolved, That the charges preferred by C. C. ELLSWORTH against the keepers of the restaurant of the House be referred to a select committee of five, who, when appointed, are instructed to investigate the matter so referred, and report to this House their findings thereon as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER. This is not a question of privilege.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I think it is.

The SPEAKER. In what respect?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. It concerns employés of this House, having relation to their conduct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs to differ from the gentlemen. As much as he may desire to see the object the gentleman has in view executed, he is at a loss to know how this can be considered a question of privilege.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I present my views on it. I regard it as a question of privilege.

Mr. COOK. Let it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Chair will entertain the proposition.

Mr. HOOKER. Let it be again read.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I hold it to be a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot hold it to be a question of privilege, because there is no warrant under the rules for such interpretation or construction.

Mr. EDEN. Let it be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. HOOKER. Let the proposition be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. EDEN. There is no need of a select committee. This should be referred to the appropriate standing committee.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Let it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The proper reference would be to the committee having the appointment of the keeper of the restaurant—the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move its reference to that committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection to the introduction of the resolution and the paper presented by the gentleman from Michigan, the Chair will entertain the motion for consideration or for its reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The keeper of the restaurant is not an officer of the House. His appointment is with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and that is the proper committee for its consideration.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. That committee will not act on it.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I understand the gentleman to say that committee will not act on it. I wish to know by what authority he makes that statement. When were charges made against the keeper of the restaurant and inquiry was ordered by the House and that committee refused to investigate them?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I understand this to be the fact and I think I know this to be the fact that the committee do not act.

Mr. FRANKLIN. If the gentleman understands that to be the fact he understands something that is not the fact.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that a complaint of this sort was heretofore made to the Speaker, and he communicated the same to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the chairman of that committee took immediate steps to rectify what was complained of.

Mr. COOK. I will add to what has been stated by the Chair that I went to the keeper of the restaurant and notified him that he would be removed for any violation of that rule so soon as the committee should have information that it had been violated. I have not been in the restaurant since.

Mr. EDEN. I demand the previous question on the motion to refer.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the paper submitted by Mr. ELLSWORTH and the accompanying resolution were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COOK. I desire to ask the reference of a bill to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BREWER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan insists on his demand for the regular order, which is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

CENSUS BILL.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a question of privilege. The Committee on the Census has leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. On public bill days.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think no one will object to the request I desire to make. It is merely that the bill which I introduced on behalf of the Committee on the Census may be reprinted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is bound to protect committees and the body of the House on Friday from the introduction of matters of a public character, for the reason that private bills have but that one day in the week; and if that day is infringed upon private bills would not get that just consideration which they should have. But the Chair will submit the request of the gentleman from New York that there be a reprint of the bill introduced by himself as chairman of the Committee on the Census.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 5765) to provide for taking the Federal census was ordered to be reprinted.

BUSINESS OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] to withdraw for a moment the demand for the regular order that I may prefer a request from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BREWER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KNOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask unanimous consent that on next Monday evening a session may be held, commencing at half past seven o'clock, for the consideration of reports from that committee.

The SPEAKER. That would have to be by unanimous consent.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request made by the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Will that include the right to pass bills?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Then I must object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-six minutes past twelve o'clock, the business of the morning hour being reports from committees of a private nature. The call rests with the Committee on Private Land Claims. At the close of the morning hour on last Friday, the bill (S. No. 854) for the adjudication of title to lands claimed by José Apis and Pablo Apis, in the State of California, was under consideration. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the legal representatives, successors, or assignees of José Apis and Pablo Apis, or either of them, be, and they are hereby, permitted to file their claim and title to a certain tract of land in California known as La Iolla Rancho in and before the United States district court of California; and that said court shall have the same jurisdiction in all things, to be exercised originally, to hear and determine upon the said claim and title, and to confirm or reject the same, as the several district courts had under the act of Congress of March 3, 1851, and acts amendatory thereunto. And the Supreme Court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine said cause upon appeal, as decided in said acts: Provided, That no lands shall be confirmed to said claimants by said decree to which there are valid claims existing under the pre-emption, homestead, or other laws of the United States at the date of the passage of this act; nor shall any decree of confirmation affect any valid adverse right of any other person or persons, or give to the confirmees, or any of them, any claim upon the United States for compensation for any land such confirmees may lose by reason of pre-emption or homestead claims or adverse rights as aforesaid; and that no decree shall be rendered for more than two square leagues: Provided further, That said claimants, before filing their claim and title, shall execute releases to any persons who may be in possession of any portion of said lands under valid claims under the pre-emption, homestead, or other laws of the United States at the date of the passage of this act to the portions of said lands so held respectively; and before rendering a decree in confirmation the said court shall ascertain that said releases have been duly executed.

Mr. REAGAN. Is there a report accompanying the bill

Mr. DENISON. There is.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that the report may be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred Senate bill No. 854 entitled "An act for the adjudication of title to lands claimed by José Apis and Pablo Apis, in the State of California," respectfully report that they have considered the same and recommend concurrence in its passage.

Mr. EDEN. Is the Senate report on the desk?

Mr. DENISON. I do not know whether the Senate report is there or not. I can state in a moment what the case is.

This bill has reference only to two leagues of land. It is limited by the terms of the bill to two square leagues. Originally the grant was made to a family by the name of Apis by the Spanish government. They took possession under the Spanish government and occupied the land, and have continued to do so; and their descendants occupy it now. The land having been granted to them while they were Spaniards, and they never having learned the English language, they never knew of or knew about any law by which they could have their title confirmed under the United States Government. In the course of time one of the men to whom the land was granted died and his administrator was unable to find the deed making the grant; and while he was searching for the grant the time in which he should have presented the claim expired. Meantime the other grantee, a brother of the deceased man, also died. Each left a daughter. And these two daughters and their descendants are the present owners of these lands; but the bill provides that they and their representatives may go before the United States courts and have their title confirmed under the Spanish grant exactly as if they had not been limited by the act, and it expressly prevents any possible injury to anybody else. It provides that they shall execute a release to anybody claiming the lands. Everybody is protected. No injury can happen and it would be great injustice to these parties not to pass the bill. The question has been examined thoroughly by a committee of the Senate and also by a committee of the House, and both committees are unanimous in their report. I trust there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DENISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND CLAIM IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. McGOWAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 753, to confirm certain land claims in the Territory of New Mexico, and put it upon its passage. It is a bill identical with one favorably reported by the committee.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico known as the Mesita Juana Lopez grant, made by the Spanish government January 18, 1782, examined, approved, and recommended for confirmation by the surveyor-general of New Mexico November 29, 1872, designated as private land claim No. 64, and duly surveyed by the United States, the field-notes of the survey and plat being approved by the surveyor-general of New Mexico on February 28, 1877, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed: Provided, That the foregoing confirmation shall only be construed as a quitclaim or relinquishment of all title or claim on the part of the United States in and to said private land claim, and shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the same; nor shall the United States be liable to make compensation for any part of said land to which there are or may be any adverse rights or claim.

No objection being made, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. McGOWAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASSIGNMENT OF LAND SCRIP.

On motion of Mr. GUNTER, the bill (S. No. 109) defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives, was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The bill was then read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever, in cases prosecuted under the acts of Congress of June 22, 1860, March 2, 1867, and the first section of the act of June 10, 1872, providing for the adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, the validity of the claim has been, or shall be hereafter, recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the court has decreed that the plaintiff or plaintiffs is or are entitled to enter a certain number of acres upon the public lands of the United States, subject to private entry at $1.25 per acre, or to receive certificate of location for as much of the land the title to which has been established as has been disposed of by the United States, certificate of location shall be issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, attested by the seal of said office, to be located as provided for in the sixth section of the aforesaid act of Congress of June 22, 1860, or applied according to the provisions of the second section of this act; and said certificate of location or scrip shall be subdivided according to the request of the confirmee or confirmees, and, as nearly as practicable, in conformity with the legal divisions and subdivisions of the public lands of the United States, and shall be, and are hereby declared to be, assignable by deed or instrument of writing, according to the form and pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, so as to vest the assignee with all the rights of the original owners of the scrip, including the right to locate the scrip in his own name.

SEC. 2. That such scrip shall be received from actual settlers only in payment of pre-emption claims or in commutation of homestead claims, in the same manner and to the same extent as is now authorized by law in the case of military bounty land warrants.

SEC. 3. That the register of the proper land office, upon any such certificate being located, shall issue, in the name of the party making the location, a certificate of entry, upon which, if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that such certificate has been fairly obtained, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, a patent shall issue, as in other cases, in the name of the locator or his legal representative.

SEC. 4. That the provisions of this act respecting the assignment and patenting of scrip and its application to pre-emption and homestead claims shall apply to the indemnity certificates of location provided for by the act of the 2d of June, 1858, entitled "An act to provide for the location of certain confirmed private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes."

Mr. EDEN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report in that case was read, as follows:

The private land claims which are recognized by this bill, with many others which have been from time to time recognized and adjusted, had their origin prior to the purchase of the province of Louisiana by the United States from France. The treaty of purchase specially recognized the rights of property in the then inhabitants. The third article of the treaty of April 30, 1803, is as follows:

"The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."—8 Stat. at Large, 202.

This obligation has been repeatedly recognized by Congress, and various acts have been passed, from 1806 to 1858, providing for commissioners to hear and determine the claims of parties to lands embraced within the territory thus acquired, and to report lists of such lands as, in the opinion of the commissioners, should be confirmed to the claimants.

Under these several acts lands were, from time to time, confirmed to the respective claimants. The greater portion of these claimants took their lands in place, but some were unable to do so for various reasons, but principally because the United States had disposed of the particular lands to which their claims attached. To remedy this difficulty Congress passed the act of June 2, 1858, (11 Stat. at Large, 295,) providing that "where any private land claim has been confirmed by Congress, and the same, in whole or in part, has not been located or satisfied, either for want of a specific location prior to such confirmation or for any reason whatsoever other than a discovery of fraud in such claim subsequent to such confirmation, it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general of the district in which such claim was situated, upon satisfactory proof that such claim has been so confirmed, and that the same, in whole or in part, remains unsatisfied, to issue to the claimant, or his legal representatives, a certificate of location for a quantity of land equal to that so confirmed and unsatisfied; which certificate may be located upon any of the public lands of the United States subject to sale at private entry at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre: Provided, That such location shall conform to legal divisions and subdivisions."

Congress also, by act of June 22, 1860, (12 Stat. at Large, 85,) the operation of which was extended by acts of March 2, 1867, (14 Stat. at Large, 544,) and June 10, 1872, (17 Stat. at Large, 378,) authorized claimants to proceed to establish their claims by petition in the district court, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

In cases where claims have been held valid under the statute above cited, and where the court has decreed that the claimants are entitled to enter a specified number of acres of the lands of the United States subject to entry, or to receive certificates of location for such proportion of the lands decreed to them as have been disposed of by the United States, the bill under consideration authorizes the subdivision of the same into quantities as nearly as practicable conforming to the legal divisions and subdivisions of the public lands of the United States; and also authorizes the assignment of the certificates of location, by written instrument, so as to vest the assignee with all the rights of the original owner, including the right to locate the scrip in his own name.

The bill further proposes to make all such scrip receivable from actual settlers in payment of pre-emption claims, or in commutation of homestead claims, in the same manner as now authorized by law in case of military bounty land warrants.

The third section provides for the issue of certificates of entry by the proper local land officer in the name of the parties making the location, and for the issue of patents by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, if he shall be satisfied that such certificates have been fairly obtained. The right of these parties to enter certain quantities of the public land or to receive certificates of location for so much as had previously been disposed of by the Government rests upon the decrees of the courts, as above set forth. Where the right to lands is recognized by the courts, and the Government has, by its previous disposition of them, deprived the parties of the enjoyment of the particular lands claimed, these certificates entitle the claimants to similar quantities of the public lands, and, to render them available, their subdivision to conform them to the legal subdivisions of the public domain is authorized.

A bill similar to the one under consideration was considered by the Committee on Private Land Claims of the House of Representatives at the last session of the Forty-fourth Congress and a favorable report was made, the views expressed in which we have adopted as the basis of this report. The Commissioner of the General Land Office approved the purpose of that bill, and suggested certain amendments which have been embodied in the present measure, which has also received the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to inquire how much land is involved in this bill or will be conveyed by the land scrip?

Mr. GUNTER. There is no land conveyed. There are about three hundred thousand acres involved, one hundred and twenty thousand of which belong to a school at Baltimore and one at New Orleans; it only affects three hundred thousand acres in all.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GUNTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELINQUISHMENT OF TITLE.

Mr. GUNTER, from the Committee on Private Land-Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 5439) relinquishing the right of the United States to an island therein named; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF ISRAEL DODGE.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported, as a substitute for House bill 3483, a bill (H. R. No. 5861) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Israel Dodge, deceased; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Israel Dodge, deceased.

Whereas it appears that the claim of Israel Dodge or his legal representatives was confirmed by the act of Congress entitled "An act to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri," approved June 21, 1860, to the extent of seven thousand and fifty-six arpents, equal to six thousand and two acres and fifty-hundredths of an acre, and that on the 22d day of December, 1865, a certificate of location, No. 2, was issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in full satisfaction of said claim of Israel Dodge, erroneously reciting the act of Congress approved June 2, 1858, as the authority for the issue of said certificate; and

Whereas it appears that certain tracts of land subject to location and entry under the provisions of the aforesaid act of June 21, 1860, have been duly entered under and by virtue of said certificate, and in part satisfaction thereof: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to issue patents to such of the legal representatives of Israel Dodge, deceased, as may be entitled to them for lands entered under and by virtue of certificate of location No. 2 issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the 22d day of December, 1865, to the legal representatives of said Israel Dodge, under and by virtue of act of Congress approved June 2, 1858, as though said lands had been entered under and by virtue of a certificate duly issued in accordance with the provisions of the second section of the act of June 21, 1860: Provided, Said entries be found free from objections in every other particular, and that for the remainder of the land yet authorized to be located under said certificate upon the surrender thereof, he issue to the legal representatives aforesaid, who may be legally entitled thereto, certificates of location in quantities not to exceed eight acres, each of which may be located upon any lands not mineral of the United States subject to entry under the laws thereof, and the lands located therewith patented in like manner as other public lands of the United States: Provided, That the location in each case shall conform to the legal subdivisions of the public surveys.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] if there are any adverse claimants to these lands?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. There are none. This bill is intended merely to correct a mistake made in the certificate of location. That certificate referred to the act of 1858 for the authority for its issue, when in point of fact it was the act of 1860 which authorized it. The Commissioner of the General Land Office now refuses to issue a patent upon the certificate of location because of this erroneous recital. The object of this bill is to correct that mistake and authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue the patent.

Mr. EDEN. I would inquire if the residue of this certificate can under this bill be located upon lands that are held at higher rates than $1.25 an acre?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. No, sir, the bill especially so provides.

Mr. EDEN. The bill provides that it shall not be located upon mineral lands; but may it not be located upon lands within the limit of grants which are held at higher rates than $1.25 per acre?

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. It is expressly limited to $1.25 an acre.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN SAN MATEO COUNTY, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GUNTER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4886) to authorize the correction of boundaries of certain lands in San Mateo County, California.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any and all persons claiming land the title of which was derived through the grant of the Mexican authorities to Juan Coppinger, known as the Cañada de Raimando rancho, situated in San Mateo County, in the State of California, and which lands are alleged to have been erroneously included in the survey, location, and patent of the Pulgas rancho, in said county, contrary to the boundaries originally designated by the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered at the December term, 1855, of said court, shall have the right to contest the said location in their own names, without leaving the State, by suit in chancery in the circuit court of the United States, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court; and said courts are hereby given jurisdiction of the same and authorized to correct the said boundaries and to reform the patents to either or both of said ranchos, if they shall be found not to be in conformity with the decree of the Supreme Court, and to give such other and further relief as equity and justice may require.

The United States and all persons having an interest in the subject-matter of said suit or in the adjustment of the lines of the patents, if determined upon by the court, shall be made parties defendant; and any party defendant may rely upon any legal or equitable defense except the lapse of time during which the opposite party had, under existing laws, no remedy in the courts; and either party may appeal to the higher Federal courts and on up to the Supreme court of the United States in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would inquire of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GUNTER] how much land is involved in this bill?

Mr. GUNTER. It does not involve any land; it is merely to correct the boundaries of certain lands. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. PAGE. Is it proposed to put this bill on its passage now?

Mr. GUNTER. That is the proposition.

Mr. PAGE. There will be objection, and it may as well go to the Committee of the Whole at once, so as to save the time that will be required to read the report.

Mr. GUNTER. I prefer to have the report read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred House bill No. 1871, entitled "A bill to authorize the correction of boundaries of certain lands in San Mateo County, California," have considered the same, and report the accompanying bill as a substitute therefor, with the recommendation that the substitute do pass. The facts are fully set forth in the printed report of Hon. S. L. MAYHAM, made to the Forty-second Congress, which is hereto annexed and made a part hereof.

THOMAS TURNER.

Report of the subcommittee on Private Land Claims in the matter of the boundary line of the Las Pulgas rancho.

The undersigned subcommittee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Dennis Martin and others, asking for authority to contest the correctness of the survey and location of a land grant in California, respectfully reports to the Committee on Private Land Claims as follows:

That on the 27th day of November, 1835, José Castro, political chief and governor ad interim of Alta California, granted to the heirs of Arguello a tract of land called Las Pulgas, and bounded on the south by the arroyo of San Francisquito; on the north by the San Mateo; on the east by the estuaries or bay; on the west by Cañada de Raimando, and in said grant described the same as being four leagues in latitude and one in longitude. That the western boundary of said grant was surveyed and marked, and juridical possession was given to said grantee establishing the westerly bounds thereof one league west of the estuary or bay of San Francisco. (Arguello vs. U. S., 18 Howard, 539.)

In 1852 the Las Pulgas claimants petitioned the California land commissioners for a confirmation of their claim to the amount of twelve leagues, and the commissioners rejected the claim for twelve leagues, but confirmed the claim for four leagues, which decision was confirmed by the United States district court, from which an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and heard at the December term, 1855, when the decision of the district court was affirmed and the land described in the decree as follows: "Bounded on the south by arroyo or creek of San Francisquito; on the north by the creek of San Mateo; on the east esteros or waters of the bay of San Francisco, and on the west by the eastern borders of the valley known as the Cañada de Raimando, said land being of the extent of four leagues in length and one in breadth, be the same more or less."

On the 19th of December, 1856, John C. Hayes, United States surveyor-general for California, returned to the General Land Office field-notes and a map purporting to be a survey of the Las Pulgas rancho, including an area of land of the amount of 35,240 acres, and the 2d day of October, 1857, the Commissioner of the General Land Office issued a patent to the heirs at law and legal representatives of Luis Arguello, deceased—a patent for the land embraced in that survey, but provided in said patent that in virtue of the fifteenth section of the act of March 3, 1851, the confirmation of said claim and the patent shall not affect the rights of third parties.

The survey by Hayes, and the patent issued in accordance therewith of the Pulgas rancho, was not limited in quantity to the amount in the original grant or that specified in the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States confirming the same, but was, as appears by the certificate of the county surveyor of San Mateo County, three Spanish leagues wide at the southerly end, one and four-tenths leagues at the center, and one and six-tenths leagues at the northerly end, and embraced land in excess of the original grant of one league in width to the amount of 17,490 acres, or nearly double that of the original grant.

2. On the 3d of August, 1840, Governor Alvarado, then governor of California, granted to John Coppinger the tract of land known as the Cañada de Raimando. This grant was bounded on the east by the Rancho de Las Pulgas, which, at that time, must have been understood as extending but one league from the Bay of San Francisco according to the terms of the grant. On the 15th of March, 1843, John Coppinger conveyed by deed (which was duly recorded) to Dennis Martin a large portion of the southeast portion of this grant, and in said deed described the same as bounded on the south by the creek of San Francisquito, and on the east by the grant of Las Pulgas, and said Martin, regarding the extreme westerly bound of the Las Pulgas to be located one league from the bay, took possession of said land described in his deed and continued in undisturbed possession thereof while it remained under the Mexican government, and for a long time thereafter, and made improvements to the amount of $75,000 to $100,000 on the same. The balance of the grant to Coppinger was occupied by him until his death in 1846, except such portions of the same as he had conveyed to other parties. The claimants of the Coppinger grant petitioned the commissioners to be allowed to intervene in the name of the United States, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1851, for the purpose of showing that the Pulgas rancho did not extend but one league from the bay, but were denied that privilege at the hearing of the Pulgas claim in 1852.

But there does not appear to be anything in the decision of the commissioners, or of the district or Supreme Court, that affects the rights of the Coppinger claimants, or that in any way extends the rights of the Pulgas claimants beyond the league line, or over one league from the bay. On the contrary, the language of the court in the case of Arguello vs. The United States (18 Howard, 539) seems to be adverse to the floating of the Pulgas rancho beyond one league from the bay. The court says: "The Mexican authorities have themselves given a construction to this grant in 1840, when they granted the Cañada de Raimando to Coppinger, calling for Las Pulgas as its eastern boundary. Moreover, juridical possession was given to the Arguellos, establishing the western boundary of the Las Pulgas one league west of the estuary or bay of San Francisco."

The inference is inevitable from this language that the court regarded the league line as the westerly limits of the Pulgas rancho; and if this is so, then the adjudication of the Supreme Court is an adjudication in favor of and not against the rights of the petitioners, and their rights are affected only by the acts of the surveyor in making the survey, and the Commissioner of the Land Office in issuing a patent not in accordance with the grant or the decision of the Supreme Court.

On the 23d of November, 1853, the commissioners of California confirmed the title of the Coppinger grant, and bounded on the east by the Rancho de Las Pulgas. If the westerly line of the Pulgas rancho had been the league line, or a line one league from the bay, this would have been a correct description. But by the survey and patent the Pulgas rancho had been floated beyond the limits of the league line from the bay. In other words, the grant which had the bay as one of its fixed boundaries, and which by its terms was limited to one league in width from the bay, had been extended two leagues beyond that limit, and in that way the Coppinger grant had been crowded back to make room for the growing dimensions of the Pulgas rancho, and to this proof of expansion and removal the heirs of Coppinger have failed to interpose any effectual resistance.

But to the grantees of Coppinger, who had purchased their lands and paid for them when the line one league from the bay was, by all parties, regarded as the exterior boundary of the Pulgas grant, this extension of the Pulgas rancho was total absorption and annihilation, and unless they can be protected in the courts or in Congress they are remediless.

Can they be protected in the courts? If so, they would not seek congressional aid. In Waterman vs. Smith, (13 Cal. R., 373,) the court says the patent is conclusive evidence of the right of the patentee to the land described therein, not only between himself and the United States, but as between himself and a third person, who has not superior title from a source of paramount proprietorship.

"This being the settled law of California, and conclusive evidence of title in the patentee, he can maintain ejectment at law for all lands embraced in his patent against persons in possession holding adversely to him, or may defend himself in his possession against any person seeking to evict him by or under an adverse title."

But it can hardly be pretended that this power, under a patent, is so crystallized as to defy the power of Congress in cases where a patent has been either erroneously or fraudulently located, especially if the party injured was not a party to the location or the fraud.

By the terms of section 15 of the act of March 3, 1851, as well as by the express language of the Pulgas patent, the rights of third parties are reserved and protected, and in the case of Minturn vs. Bovee (24 Cal. R., 644) the court says: "Third persons must be regarded to be all persons who are not parties to the proceeding before the land commissioners, or standing in such relation with those who were parties thereto as to become affected and bound as privies, and the interest of third persons that remain unaffected by the final confirmation and patent, and those subsisting in perfect title derived from a source of paramount proprietorship, which could be used in resisting successfully the action of the Government respecting them."

The grant to Coppinger was perfect in itself. It was an absolute conveyance to him as full and ample as letters-patent could be from the United States.

This deed to his grantees passed to and vested in them a perfect title, which they held at the time of the acquisition of this territory by the United States.

The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo imposed upon the United States the duty of protecting the title of those who had perfect titles to real estate under the Mexican Government, as well as that of perfecting such titles as were in their nature inchoate.

These parties having been divested of their legal title by a proceeding to which they were not parties, and over which they could not exercise any control, are still the equitable owners of these lands, and the persons in whom the legal title is by this patent vested should be treated as trustees for the benefit of those having the equitable title.

That they have bought and held these lands in good faith is evidenced by their original purchase and title-deed, and by their long occupancy and substantial improvements.

They were transferred by the act of annexation from one sovereignty to another, and every principle of justice, humanity, and civilization requires that the Government extending its jurisdiction over them should extend its protection as well as its authority.

The petitioners have not had a day in court, or an opportunity to defend themselves against the overshadowing claim of the Pulgas rancho. Their grantor did not contest the location of the line on appeal to the Supreme Court, and that question has never been presented to that tribunal or adjudicated by it. The only question that seems to have been litigated is, as to the validity of the respective grants, and not as to their location or boundaries, except as that question has incidentally occurred in the description of the land as contained in the grant.

Unless the petitioners are permitted to contest the correctness of the location of the exterior lines of the Pulgas rancho and the survey of the grant, they will be forced to relinquish their claim to their lands, which they bought in good faith of a grantor having a valid Mexican title, and have occupied for more than a quarter of a century, and upon which they have made valuable and expensive improvements.

I therefore recommend that the bill introduced by Mr. LUTTRELL be reported to the House, and that this committee recommend its passage.

S. L. MAYHAM,
Subcommittee Private Land Claims.

Mr. GUNTER. I now ask the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I object.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman who has this bill in charge if this same bill was not reported against by a majority of the Committee on Private Land Claims of the Forty-fourth Congress?

Mr. GUNTER. I believe such a report was ordered; whether made or not I cannot tell.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Was not this same question adjudicated by the courts twenty years ago?

Mr. BLOUNT. I must object to the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. And I object to it.

The SPEAKER. On what ground?

Mr. DAVIS, of California. On a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order which the gentleman makes against the bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of California. It involves costs of litigation; the Government is made a defendant in the suit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the bill grants no additional land; it is simply to correct a boundary-line of certain lands in question.

Mr. LUTTRELL. It does not grant an acre of land or a dollar of money.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair is advised at present, there is no point of order resting against the bill. The Chair, however, will listen to the gentleman from California [Mr. DAVIS] if he has any views to suggest.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I understand that this bill makes the Government liable for costs, and thereby increases the expenditures of the Government. I have not carefully read the bill, but I gathered that from hearing it read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The impression of the Chair is that the provision making the Government one of the parties defendant is merely a matter of form—that the real parties involved are the two grantees.

Mr. GUNTER. The suit will not be determined either for or against the Government. The Government is not necessarily a party to the suit. The real litigation is between the two parties claiming the land.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only look upon the face of the bill, and is unable to see wherein any point of order rests against this bill.

Mr. PAGE. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. PAGE. When will it expire?

The SPEAKER. In six minutes.

Mr. PAGE. The Chair does not propose to limit debate on this bill to six minutes?

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the House to control.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GUNTER. I call for the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. My motion to refer was first made.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman was not recognized by the Chair to submit that motion. The Chair recognizes the gentleman reporting the bill as the one entitled to take charge of it. If the House agrees with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] and the gentleman from California [Mr. DAVIS] all it has to do is to vote down the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Pending the call for the previous question, is not a motion to commit in order?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order; and if agreed to, the bill will go over as unfinished business until next Friday.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. The next day the committee is reached, it will come up of course.

Mr. PAGE. I think that my colleague, [Mr. DAVIS, of California,] who has made this objection, ought to have an opportunity to state it.

The SPEAKER. After the previous question is sustained there will be an hour for debate, under the control of the gentleman reporting the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I would prefer not to have the time in that shape.

Mr. GUNTER. We will divide the time.

Mr. CONGER. I made an inquiry whether pending a demand for the previous question a motion to recommit would be in order. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to move to recommit.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I did, but the motion was not entertained; and then I made a motion to adjourn, which is in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion to adjourn. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] the Chair will say that while the demand for the previous question is pending a motion to recommit is not in order. The call for the previous question must be voted upon; and if the House desires further debate beyond the hour which would be allowed after the previous question is ordered, or desires to throw the bill open to amendment, it is within the power of the House to vote down the call for the previous question.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, that the House adjourn, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill to withdraw the call for the previous question and allow the majority report of the committee of the Forty-fourth Congress to be read. The gentleman has had his report read.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the report would be in the nature of debate, and unless the gentleman from Arkansas yields——

Mr. GUNTER. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I submit that the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. There is one minute remaining.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the point of order already made was well taken. I ask the Clerk to read from the bill at line 21, page 2.

Mr. PAGE. Is it not in order to move to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. PAGE. I make that motion.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the point of order already submitted is well taken, and I ask the Clerk to read the clause of the bill to which I have referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

The United States and all persons having an interest in the subject-matter of said suit or in the adjustment of the lines of the patents, if determined upon by the court, shall be made parties defendant; and any party defendant may rely upon any legal or equitable defense, except the lapse of time during which the opposite party had, under existing laws, no remedy in the courts; and either party may appeal to the higher Federal courts, and on up to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the manner now provided by law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not find anywhere in the bill any language appropriating a dollar of money or donating an acre of land belonging to the United States.

Mr. PAGE. It involves private parties in litigation.

The SPEAKER. That the Chair does not take cognizance of.

Mr. PAGE. I understand that.

Mr. THOMPSON. But if the Speaker please, the Government is made a party in the litigation provided for in the bill, and its rights are to be concluded by that litigation, if it result adversely to the Government, as it is to be presumed it will.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that the Government of the United States has already by law parted with all its interest in the lands which are in controversy between individuals, as mentioned in this bill.

Mr. LUTTRELL. And agreed by a treaty to protect these litigants.

The SPEAKER. The Government of the United States does not make any donation of land or any appropriation of money by this bill. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. THOMPSON. But the Speaker does not understand the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he does.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Government may have parted with all its title; and then this bill makes the Government a defendant in a case in which it has no interest. The litigation in which the Government is thus made a party must be a charge upon the Government.

The SPEAKER. The expense of any such litigation is provided for in another bill. The judicial expenses of the Government are provided for in one of the regular appropriation bills——

Mr. THOMPSON. But this increases such expenses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, while anxious to treat the gentleman from Pennsylvania with entire fairness, does not see how the bill can be reached by a point of order.

Mr. THOMPSON. What I mean is this: when this bill makes the Government a defendant, whether it has any claim or not, (and if it has no claim my point is so much the stronger, as a party who has no interest is compelled to defend,) can it be said there is no expense incurred?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think he is required to argue this point; but if for the sake of argument the case was as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, still the language of this bill does not authorize the payment of any money out of the Treasury. Any expense of costs is provided for by other law or laws. The Chair has already overruled the point of order. The pending question is on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. The situation of the bill is this: the gentleman from Arkansas demands the previous question, pending which the gentleman from California moves that the bill be laid upon the table.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4234) to provide that all pensions on account of death, or wounds received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, which have been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall commence from the date of death or discharge from the service of the United States; for the payment of arrears of pensions, and other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 5067) to divide the western district of Missouri into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes.

G. H. HILL.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5860) to remove the political disabilities of G. H. Hill, of Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BRIGHT moved the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. MILLS in the chair.

HEIRS OF BRIGADIER-GENERAL WILLIAM THOMPSON.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the Private Calendar, and the first business in order is a bill (H. R. No. 934) for the relief of the heirs of Brigadier-General William Thompson, of the revolutionary army.

Mr. MACKEY. Mr. Chairman, I move by unanimous consent that bill be passed over for the present, not to lose its place upon the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

SAMUEL P. TODD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2160) for the relief of the heirs of Samuel P. Todd, deceased, late a purser in the United States Navy.

The bill, which was read, directs that there be paid to James Todd, administrator of the estate of Samuel P. Todd, deceased, late a purser in the United States Navy, for the use and benefit of the heirs-at-law of said Samuel P. Todd, deceased, the sum of $4,000, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The report was read, as follows:

The memorialist, Samuel P. Todd, on the 5th day of October, 1839, being at that time a purser in the Navy of the United States, was ordered to the United States ship Potomac, one of the squadron on the Brazil station, as purser. On the 5th day of July, 1840, he was appointed by Commodore Charles G. Ridgeley, who was commander-in-chief of the said squadron, special Navy agent for procuring and disbursing moneys for the use of the squadron, there being at that time no agent upon that station authorized by the Navy Department to draw for funds.

The following is the letter of appointment:

UNITED STATES SHIP POTOMAC,
Rio de Janeiro, July 5, 1840.

SIR: As there is no agent upon this station authorized by the Navy Department to draw for funds for the use of the squadron, I have deemed it expedient to appoint one, and I do hereby appoint you a special agent for that purpose.

You will therefore, whenever funds are required for the use of the squadron, draw bills of exchange upon the Navy Department or upon Messrs. Baring Brothers & Co., of London, in my favor, and present them to me for indorsement, after which you will negotiate them upon the most favorable terms for the United States, taking care to procure the proper vouchers, as accounts of sales, certificates, &c., which vouchers you will lay before me for my approval.

The pursers of the squadron will make their requisitions upon you, approved by their commanders and myself, for the funds required for the respective vessels to which they belong; and for the labor and responsibility which will devolve upon you in consequence of this appointment you will, I presume, be allowed by the Navy Department the same compensation as is made to agents upon other stations, to which I conceive you will be justly entitled.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CH. G. RIDGELEY,
Commodore and Commander-in-Chief of the United States Naval Forces on Coast of Brazil and Rio La Plata.

To SAMUEL P. TODD,
Purser United States Ship Potomac.

It will be readily perceived that Mr. Todd was appointed on the express ground that there was no authorized agent on the station authorized to raise and disburse funds, and for negotiating bills of exchange, and for keeping accounts of the larger disbursements to the subordinate disbursing officers for the general use of the squadron.

Under this appointment, which the memorialist was not at liberty to decline, being ordered by his superior officer, Mr. Todd negotiated for and disbursed more than $300,000, and he claims as compensation therefor 2½ per cent. upon the amount so negotiated and disbursed.

At that time the squadron on the Pacific station consisted of the same force as that on the Brazilian station, and the agency of the business similar to that devolved on the memorialist was performed by Messrs. Edward McCall & Co., temporary agents for the Pacific squadron, and they were allowed a salary of $4,000 for the same.

At the same time the squadron on the Mediterranean station consisted of about the same force as the Brazilian, and the agency thereof was just about the same as the Pacific and that performed by the memorialist, and was performed by Messrs. Fitch, Brothers & Co., of Marseilles, and it is understood that they were allowed a commission of 5 per cent. upon the money disbursed, and the money, besides, being advanced to them and paid in to their mercantile house in New York.

At the same time the squadron on the West India station consisted of one frigate and two sloops of war, and the agency was performed by Messrs. Furniss & Co., of St. Thomas, and your committee are informed, and they think credibly, that they received 2½ per cent. commission.

The memorialist discharged the duties of his said special agency from the 5th day of July, 1840, the date of his appointment, to the 20th day of December, 1841, a period of nearly eighteen months, and no impeachment whatever was ever made of the ability or fidelity with which he conducted said extraordinary duties so cast upon him. And your committee come to the conclusion that the Navy Department, by acquiescing in this appointment and permitting it to continue, confirmed it in all things, and are now estopped from denying that they authorized the services to be performed or that the United States is not bound in honor and law to pay for the same what it was reasonably worth.

But the Department refuses the compensation asked for the petitioner, and rests its refusal upon the ground that by law no extra compensation can be allowed to persons receiving an annual salary or pay and emoluments fixed by law from the Government.

But your committee fully coincide with Hon. H. D. Gilpin, former Attorney-General, and whose opinion is filed in this case, that there is nothing in this construction which prevents an officer who is receiving a salary or fixed compensation for his particular office from being also paid for services not belonging to that office which he is legitimately required to discharge, provided these services are such as are recognized by law as entitled to compensation.

It was not as purser of the Potomac that Mr. Todd drew the bills or raised the money for the squadron; as such he would have had no right to draw them; it was as special agent, special Navy agent, taking the place of a Navy agent on the station, and he took it by order and appointment of the commander of the squadron, on the express ground stated in the order that it was too remote from the residence of any Navy agent to procure the money in that manner.

If a Navy agent then had been on the station, he would have been entitled to compensation for the services the memorialist performed. On what principle of law or justice it can then be withheld from Mr. Todd your committee are unable to see.

A similar agency for the same station was intrusted to Purser Daragh in the years 1826 and 1827, and a commission of 2½ per cent. was allowed him as such agent, in addition to his compensation as purser, on the amount of bills drawn by him for the use of the squadron.

On the Pacific station, in the interval between the agency of Mr. White, who resided at Lima, and who left there about 1833, and that of Messrs. E. McCagg & Co., which commenced in 1838, Edward M. Coxe, actual purser of the Vincennes sloop of war, was appointed special agent on the station, and on his leaving there Joseph Wilson, actual purser on the North Carolina, (seventy-four,) was similarly appointed, and both of them received an allowance for the special service at the rate of $2,000 per annum, that certain sum being fixed as a compensation for it in lieu of the more inadequate one of commission.

It will be seen by the cases given above, and they were of like kind, that it has been the practice of the Government to pay extra for such services which have been performed outside of and beyond the duties properly pertaining to the proper office of the purser.

In view of the considerations above mentioned, and also of the fact that the Supreme Court have held at different times in like cases that such special agents are entitled to pay for their services, as will be seen by reference to 2 Peter's Reports, page 10; also on page 23 of the same report, in the case of Major-General Ripley; also 15 Peter's Reports, in the case of General Gratiot, wherein the Supreme Court affirmed their former decision in like cases as the one before your committee, they do therefore report a bill authorizing the payment to James Todd, administrator of the estate of Samuel P. Todd, deceased, late a purser in the United States Navy, for the benefit of the heirs at law of said Samuel P. Todd, deceased, the sum of $4,000, and recommend that the bill pass.

Mr. EDEN. It occurs to me this claim, now forty years old, if the Government ever owed it, should have been paid long ago if it were just. If we are going back forty years to settle all claims of this kind we will never get through.

Mr. BRIGHT. There have been various claims allowed by this Congress within the last two years which have gone farther back into antiquity than forty years. The age of a claim, while it may raise a presumption against it, is not conclusive against its validity. It argues on the contrary a dereliction of Congress in paying just claims of the Government when the citizen has been here toiling with this body for justice at its hands.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DANIEL W. PERKINS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. No. 850) for the relief of Daniel W. Perkins, of East Saginaw, Michigan.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Daniel W. Perkins, of East Saginaw, Michigan, the sum of $1,090, being in full for services rendered as substitute district attorney in the eastern district of Michigan, from October 1, 1871, to June 30, 1875.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has the gentleman from Michigan the statute before him under which these services were rendered?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. The statute is not here, but it has been examined thoroughly by the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let the report of the committee be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill is for the relief of Daniel W. Perkins, of East Saginaw, Michigan, who was appointed a substitute attorney under section 14 of the act of Congress of August 16, 1856, and acted as district attorney in cases before United States commissioners in Saginaw county, in said State. His claim is for services rendered from October 1, 1871, to April, 1875.

The claim of Mr. Perkins seems to your committee to be entirely just and reasonable. He allowed the matter of his compensation to run on from year to year without settlement, at the same time continuing his services as such district attorney without calling for a settlement, as he should have done. Finally, when he did present his bill for services against the Government, he was told that the appropriations for the respective years he had served the United States were exhausted, and it could not be paid without an act of Congress authorizing the payment. The act referred to fully authorizes the appointment and employment of substitute attorneys, who are to receive the same fees as the district attorney. This law continued in force up to 1874, when the Revised Statutes were adopted, at which time this provision seems to have been dropped; but the omission was not discovered by the authorities in the department until July, 1875, and notice was not given until August following.

The claimant, it seems by the printed report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Forty-fourth Congress, (which was a favorable report,) furnished said Judiciary Committee a list of the cases he tried as such substitute attorney and a full copy of his account, but the same is not now to be found; which account, as appears from said report of the Judiciary Committee, was duly certified to by the commissioners before whom the cases were pending when the services were performed; also the certificate of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, showing that the charges correspond with the cases reported, and that neither the claimant nor any one else has ever been paid for the services rendered. The district attorney also appends his certificate to the same, as appears by said report, showing that he appointed Mr. Perkins as such substitute, and that he rendered said services for several years.

The claim of the memorialist amounts to the sum of $1,090, and appended to it, as appears by said report of the said Judiciary Committee, are the following certificates:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C.:

I, James R. Cook, late United States commissioner for the eastern district of Michigan, do hereby certify that the dates stated in the foregoing cases, as examinations had before me, are correct and true, showing the time occupied in such examinations; that Daniel W. Perkins was the attorney and the only attorney who appeared for the United States Government and conducted such examinations.

JAS. R. COOK,
Late United States Commissioner, Eastern District of Michigan.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
First Comptroller's Office, July 10, 1876.

The records and files of this Department show that examinations were had in the cases specified in the foregoing statement of D. W. Perkins, substituted United States attorney in said cases * * * have been made to the said attorney or his substitute, D. W. Perkins.

R. W. TAYLER,
Comptroller.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
For the Eastern District of Michigan:

I, A. B. Maynard, United States district attorney for eastern district of Michigan, do hereby certify that D. W. Perkins, of East Saginaw, Michigan, has been my deputy at that place for a number of years; that none of the services of the said Perkins were ever audited with my services in any cases in which said Perkins appeared; that I have never been allowed or paid for any services which said Perkins has performed as such deputy district attorney; that all the pay which said Perkins has received for his services as such deputy district attorney has been allowed and audited by the First Auditor of the Treasury; and that the said Perkins should receive pay for such services as he has performed which do not appear to have been audited by the said First Auditor; that the certificate of the United States commissioner, before whom said Perkins performed said services, will show what these services were; that I have been personally acquainted with Mr. D. W. Perkins for many years, and know him to be reliable and trustworthy, and that he would not present any account for services which was not correct and true; that I personally know that he has not been paid for a number of years, but I cannot give the exact date; that the fact of his not being paid grew out of the fact of Mr. Perkins not presenting his account till after estimates for the years had been exhausted or closed.

Dated June 24, 1876.

A. B. MAYNARD,
United States District Attorney for the Eastern District of Michigan.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 5, 1876.

SIR: Your letter of the 3d instant to the First Auditor relative to a claim of Daniel W. Perkins has been referred to this office.

By section 14, act of August 16, 1856, district attorneys were authorized to employ substitutes, who were to receive the same fees as the district attorneys for like services. Mr. Perkins was so employed and so paid. His last account settled at this Department embraced services to the 30th day of September, 1871.

In the revision of the statutes of the United States the authority to employ substitutes was dropped.

It appears from the district attorney's statement that Mr. Perkins continued to act until April, 1875. I therefore presume that his claim is for compensation as substitute attorney from October 1, 1871, to April, 1875, which cannot be paid at the Treasury for want of authority. His account has probably been rendered to the Department of Justice, where it would properly go if it could be allowed.

Very respectfully,

R. W. TAYLER,
Comptroller.

Hon. N. B. BRADLEY,
House of Representatives.

It appears that the omission in the revision was not discovered till about July, 1875, and no notice was given till August, 1875, to district or substitute attorneys. They, including Mr. Perkins, continued to act in good faith, as can be ascertained from the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

Your committee, from this examination, and from the above facts as found by the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-fourth Congress, and from the evidence attached to their report, come to the conclusion that there can be no doubt about the justice of the claim of the said Daniel W. Perkins, and that it should be paid; and therefore, without waiting for the filing of a new statement of his accounts, so lost, we report back the bill so referred to said committee and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation it do pass.

ELLA P. MURPHY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1502) for the relief of Ella P. Murphy.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Ella P. Murphy, widow of Patrick Murphy, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,875, as full compensation for depredations committed by the Mescalero Apache Indians upon the property of said Patrick Murphy.

The report was read, as follows:

The bill seeks to appropriate $3,875 for losses sustained by the husband of claimant on account of depredations committed by the Mescalero Apache Indians on his property on the night of the 6th of August 1861, and in 1870, at Fort Davis, Texas.

To sustain that part of the claim occurring in 1861 there is no proof except that of Mrs. Murphy, the widow, and while there can be but little if any doubt of the loss as set out by claimant it is not deemed a safe precedent to allow such claims without certain and strict proof of the actual loss, the character and value of the property, and the identity of the tribe of Indians committing the depredation.

After investigation by the agent of the Indians charged with the depredation and the Interior Department, this part of the claim was disallowed. Another portion of the claim is for depredations committed by the same band of Indians at Fort Davis in 1870.

The sworn testimony of Captain Charles Parker shows that in the month of August, 1870, Patrick Murphy, then in the employ of the United States Government as a post-trader, lost three hundred head of sheep and goats, taken by the Indians mentioned; that Captain Parker was dispatched with his command in pursuit of the Indians, and that twenty-two head of the sheep and goats were recaptured. This testimony is further sustained by the sworn statement of Acting Assistant Surgeon Thomas Landers, United States Army. It appears that two hundred and eighty-seven sheep and goats were lost, and that they were of the value of $2.50 each. After investigation, this part of the claim, amounting to $695, was allowed by the Department and reported to Congress.

During the Forty-third Congress the Committee on Indian Affairs made a report recommending the passage of the bill for this amount.

(See Report No. 632, Forty-third Congress, first session).

Your committee recommend the following amendments, namely:

First. In seventh line, strike out the words "three thousand eight hundred and seventy-five," and insert in lieu thereof the words "six hundred and ninety-five."

Second. Add at the end of the section the words "Provided, That before paying the moneys hereby appropriated the said Ella P. Murphy shall make satisfactory proof that she is the sole heir of Patrick Murphy, late of Fort Davis, Texas, or otherwise the sole owner of the claim: And provided further, That the sum herein appropriated shall be paid out of the moneys due the Mescalero Indians of New Mexico."

With the adoption of the amendments indicated the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendments reported by the committee and contained in the report just read.

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

W. JESSE BUCHANAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1854) for the relief of W. Jesse Buchanan, late first lieutenant Third Michigan Cavalry Volunteers; which was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs adversely.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move that bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

JENKINS A. FITZGERALD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 796) for the relief of Jenkins A. Fitzgerald, assistant surgeon United States Army.

The bill, which was read, provides that the payments made by the Department of the Interior to Assistant Surgeon Jenkins A. Fitzgerald, United States Army, for medical services rendered the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians, at the request of said Department, in the absence of other medical aid, are hereby sanctioned, and the said Assistant Surgeon Fitzgerald is authorized to retain the compensation paid, anything in the statutes of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

The report was read, as follows:

This bill provides that the payment made by the Department of the Interior to Assistant Surgeon Jenkins A. Fitzgerald, United States Army, for medical services rendered the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians, at Camp Supply, Indian Territory, in the year 1869, at the request of said department, in the absence of other medical aid, shall be sanctioned, and allows him to retain the compensation, amounting to $798.33. A precisely similar bill was introduced at the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and was referred by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives to the Secretary of War, for information, and returned by the Secretary on the 8th of February, 1877, accompanied with a letter from the Adjutant-General, in which the bill is inclosed, in the following words:

"The Surgeon-General, to whom the bill for the relief of Dr. Fitzgerald was referred, reports as follows:

"It is my opinion the money was fairly earned and is justly due."

A bill of precisely similar character, for the relief of Assistant Surgeon Thomas F. Azpell, unanimously passed both branches of the Forty-fourth Congress, and was "approved January 19, 1877." (United States Statutes at Large, volume 19, page 503.)

Your committee respectfully report the bill back to the House, and recommend its passage.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. I move as a substitute for the bill the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay or cause to be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Assistant Surgeon Jenkins A. Fitzgerald, for moneys originally received by him from the Department of the Interior for medical services rendered at the Arapaho and Cheyenne Indian agency, in the year 1869 and 1870, and which moneys so received the said Jenkins A. Fitzgerald was required to return to the Treasury by order of the Second Comptroller.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. Since the introduction of the bill Assistant Surgeon Fitzgerald was compelled by order of the Second Comptroller to refund the money to the Treasury. The bill as originally introduced proposed he should retain the money; but as he has paid it back—and I have the papers here which show he has paid it back—the amendment proposed by the committee is that the money shall be refunded to him. The Surgeon-General recommends the payment; so does the Secretary of War. The Surgeon-General says this man performed these services in good faith and in ignorance of any law which prevented him from receiving compensation for them. As stated in the report, precisely a similar bill was passed by the Forty-fourth Congress.

The amendment was adopted; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL SEMINARY, VIRGINIA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 943) for the relief of the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Seminary and High School in Virginia; reported by Mr. GOODE, from the Committee on Education and Labor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, in full payment of rent due to the trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary and High School in Virginia, for the use and occupation of their buildings and other property (located near Alexandria) for hospital purposes.

SEC. 2. That this act be in force from and after the passage thereof.

The report was read, as follows:

This seminary and high school were established for the most beneficent of all purposes—that of educating and training the minds of those young men who felt called to enter upon the solemn and responsible duties of ministers of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. They were situated near Alexandria, in Fairfax County, Virginia, and within sight of the Capitol. The buildings were erected and the schools sustained by contributions from all parts of the United States. They were seventeen in number, and stand upon a tract of land containing about two hundred acres. One of these buildings was erected from funds furnished by William H. Aspinwall & Brother, of New York, and another by John Bohlen and his sister, of Philadelphia, and still another by the congregation of Saint George's church, New York. Funds were contributed from all parts of the United States to build the others. The students in these schools have been from nearly all the States—North, South, East, and West.

In the seminary there have been 601 students of divinity. Of these, 200 were from the North, 195 from the South, 19 foreigners, and 187 whose residence is not given in the catalogues. These holy men all entered the ministry. Of this number, some 440 still remain in the ministry in thirty-two States of the Union and foreign lands. One of the most important Christian denominations is indebted to this institution for one-seventh of the entire body of her clergy. Thirty-one have gone to foreign lands as missionaries, 44 are laboring in Maryland, 56 in Pennsylvania, 34 in New York. The rest are scattered in smaller numbers in other States of the Union.

The high school is a first-class preparatory school for the colleges and universities of the country. A very large number of students from all parts of the country have entered this school. These statistics are obtained from the reports up to 1871. A large number has since been added to the catalogues of both schools.

At the time the war began, in 1861, both these schools were in a most prosperous condition. Many of the buildings were new, and all were furnished in a complete manner. On the 24th of May, 1861, the Federal troops took possession of Alexandria, and soon commenced a permanent system of fortifications for the defense of the city. These fortifications embraced all the buildings of these schools, and they remained in the permanent and undisturbed occupation of the Federal Government during the whole war.

On or about the 25th August, 1861, these buildings were taken possession of by the United States authorities and converted into a brigade hospital, or an aggregation of the hospitals of the different regiments on duty in and near Alexandria. (See the order of Charles S. Tripler, surgeon of United States Army, to Brigade Surgeon George Suckley, on file in the Surgeon-General's Office.) On the 14th of August, 1865, David P. Smith, a surgeon of United States Volunteers, ordered a discontinuance of this hospital, which order is on file in the same office. So that from the 25th August, 1861, to 14th August, 1865—about four years—the Government had the entire use of these buildings. Besides the use of the buildings, a very large quantity of wood was cut from this land and used by the Government. The valuable furniture of all these buildings was either destroyed or carried away under the mistaken impression that it belonged to the Government.

Some time after the close of the war the friends of the institution from the North and South united in an application to the War Department for payment of rent and for the property destroyed. This application was indorsed by Surgeon-General Barnes as just and reasonable. The Secretary of War agreed to pay rent, but refused to pay damages, and requested a bill for rent and he would pay it.

Before this bill was presented he was informed of the law of 1867, which prohibited payment of such claims coming from the seceding States, and he advised that application be made to Congress. This application is contained in the above bill No. 948, and is only for the rent of the property. The proof before your committee shows that the reasonable rent of this property for the four years amounted to $20,000, the amount appropriated by this bill.

Upon the above statement of facts ought this claim to be paid? Your committee report in the affirmative, for the following reasons:

1. It is a benevolent and literary institution, founded by the good people of this country, North and South. Such institutions are exempted and sacred from injury by the laws of nations, and, when used for the necessary purposes of the war, should be paid for.

2. This claim would have been paid but for the law of 1867, prohibiting the payment of such claims in the seceded States. This institution, though in a seceded State, was, during the whole war, in the permanent undisturbed occupation of the Federal Government. The proclamation of President Lincoln of 16th August, 1861, a few days before these buildings were occupied, declaring that insurrection existed in certain States, expressly exempted from its operation and effect such parts as "may be from time to time occupied and controlled by the forces of the United States." Besides this continued military occupation, Alexandria was represented continuously in what was called the restored government of Virginia, which always recognized the Government of the United States and rendered obedience to its authority and laws. The seat of this restored government was in Alexandria until it was removed to Richmond in April, 1865, and became the government for the whole State of Virginia.

This institution was not, therefore, in any sense of the word, in an insurrectionary district, and was as much within the equity of the laws for the payment of this claim as any similarly situated institution in New York or Massachusetts. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Planters' Bank vs. The Union Bank, (16 Wall., 259,) decided that the city of New Orleans, in August, 1863, was so held by the United States forces. If this was true of the city of New Orleans, how can it be denied as to the locality of this institution, which was never under control of the Confederate forces for two days after the ordinance of secession was ratified by the vote of the people.

There are many precedents for the payment of claims like this. Joseph Segar was paid for use and occupation of his farm near Fortress Monroe, in Virginia. (See Statutes at Large, No. 17, page 699.) The University of Kentucky was paid for occupation of its buildings. (16 Statutes at Large, 678.)

3. For the above reasons the question of loyalty does not enter into this case. But for technical application of the law of 1867 the Secretary of War would have paid it. Although a part of a seceded State it was in no sense of the word at any time during the war in insurrection against the United States, and, as before stated, is completely within the equity of the law for payment. But how can such an eleemosynary institution as this be disloyal? Its trustees may be disloyal, but they only hold, as an artificial person under the law of incorporation, the naked legal title for the benefit of all who may hereafter reap the benefits of its teachings. Who shall say they are disloyal? Who are they, and from what section do they come? It is believed that the term disloyal cannot be applied to any such institution. It is further believed that the good faith of the Government demands its payment: that the benevolent objects of the institution call loudly on the Government, if not to repair the losses actually sustained by its occupation, at least to pay a fair rent for the use of the buildings and grounds, which, if not paid for these buildings, would of necessity have been paid for some others to shelter the sick soldiers of the Union Army.

For these reasons your committee report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. GOODE. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. CONGER. From the reading of this report the committee is informed of two things: first, that the payment of this claim is contrary to law, a consideration which sometimes has a little force with some members of the House; and perhaps it would not be a serious injury to any of us if we regarded the law in making appropriations. The next fact which we learn from this report is that these buildings were not only in a seceded State but were actually inclosed within the fortifications built by the United States, and were themselves a part and parcel of a military fortification, the erection of which we may naturally suppose was rendered necessary to secure to our soldiery the occupation of that territory.

Now, sir, I need not go again and again over the proposition that

Alexandria was a captured city, captured by our forces in the presence and occupation of a hostile army; that every building, public and private, every warehouse, every dock, was the captured property of the United States under the laws of war and the law of nations; and that our Government had the right to take any and every building under that law for its own purposes. The report shows, and I do not go outside of the report—and I thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] for having been so candid with the House in making the report—the report shows that as a war measure, after making such capture, and I do not know whether I am right in the supposition that this property was in the city of Alexandria, or whether it was property on the heights above the city of Alexandria——

Mr. GOODE. The property is about a mile beyond the limits of Alexandria.

Mr. CONGER. I had supposed so. That whole region, including the city and the surrounding suburbs, the hills and the valleys around, was captured by Union forces opposed by confederate forces; and not only was this occupied as captured territory, but the military forces of the United States thought the possession, as I suppose, of these gounds, of these buildings which were on the heights, of so much importance in the carrying on of the war and in defending their position there against the assaults of the confederate forces that they made there a military fort, inclosing within it, as the report says, these buildings and making the buildings themselves, by the act of our generals and by the act of our Army, a part of the forts of the United States.

Now, sir, if it be true that the common judgment of all men, North and South, acquiesced in the decision of Congress in regard to the payment of Dr. Best for the use of his house, and perhaps for its destruction, in a place then about to be, and which was finally, occupied by our Army for a fort; if it be true that we may use the property, the houses in which loyal citizens and their families reside without payment, without even the right of compensation—for that question arises in the Best case, whether this Government has the right, whether it can, in compliance with the laws of nations and the obligations of this Government to many thousand others in like circumstances, make payment either for the use or for the destruction of such property—I ask this committee to show how this Government can pay for using a part of its own fortresses, how it can pay for the use and occupation of property which it has not only seized and made a military fort but which it has surrounded with the ramparts of a fortress to be specially and solely, and as we may suppose necessarily, occupied, directly and absolutely, by our troops to the exclusion of every other occupancy whatever.

The cases which have been referred to by the committee are the cases of the occupation of premises, of houses, or the property of other institutions, where there was no war necessity to occupy them, where there were other buildings that could have been occupied, and where there was some agreement either direct or indirect between the Government and the owners that rent should be paid. I dislike to oppose the payment of claims to institutions of this kind as much as any other man on this floor, and I cannot divest myself of the conviction that this belongs to a class of cases which are of such a nature that if we pay one we must pay hundreds equally deserving, equally meritorious; if we pay one we must pay by thousands and by millions of dollars a class of cases which, under the law of nations, as the committee already admit, under the laws of the United States as they now exist, could not and cannot be paid.

Now, sir, I call upon the committee to show by what right this case can be taken away from the operation of existing law and in what it differs from other cases which are said to be equally meritorious. I call upon the committee to show that it does not open a class of cases to payment and prosecution which would involve the expenditure of enormous sums of money from the Treasury of the United States.

There must come a time somewhere when the dividing line between what is right for this Government to pay in these matters of war claims, and what it is not right for the Government to pay must be clearly defined.

I dislike to question every one of these claims. It is in no spirit of antagonism to the South or to Virginia. It is in no spirit of antagonism to colleges, much less to religious institutions, that I am compelled to call attention to the passage of these bills. I have not examined this case. I take it upon the report of the committee, and upon the report itself of a committee which ought not to have had this bill to report upon.

I mean by that that this is one of those bills that ought to have gone to the Committee on War Claims and been decided there according to the conditions and terms which that committee have imposed upon such claims, and which this House has instructed them to impose upon such claims.

Now, sir, I ask the gentlemen who favor this bill to show the House wherein this is different from other cases which the judgment of the House has been unable to approve of, and let us see where the dividing line stands.

It is interesting for me to know that there have been graduates who have become ministers of an influential, prosperous, and beneficial church of Christ. I rejoice that this has done much good and is now doing much good to the world of sinners; but if it be not one of the claims that are to be paid by the money from the Treasury of the United States, no matter what hallowed names are associated with it, no matter what number of ministers and missionaries may have gone forth from its walls, we are not here to vote the money of the people to pay for institutions which have done good merely. We are to pay such obligations of this Government as the good judgment and sound sense, the law of nations, the laws of our land, and the concurrent judgment of the vast mass of our constituents will warrant us to vote out of the Treasury of the United States.

Let us be informed concerning this bill, and if it be one for which I may vote in conformity with my judgment, the laws of nations, and the laws of the country; if it be a claim which the people of the United States ought to pay, as a right claim, no man will vote for it more cheerfully than I; but if it be not, however grand the institution, however hallowed its work, however glorious the names of those who have gone forth to do good in the world, I must, although reluctantly, raise my feeble voice against the passage of this or any other bill which overrides the laws of the land, the laws of war, the laws of nations, and depletes the Treasury, contrary to all those principles of law.

Mr. EDEN. I am constrained to differ with the distinguished gentleman from Michigan in reference to the propriety of paying this claim. Neither do I agree with him that it has been reported by the wrong committee. While in one sense it is a war claim in another it is an educational matter, and hence it might properly be considered by the Committee on Education and Labor. I opposed the payment for the destruction of William and Mary college for the reason that I thought it would be a bad precedent for this Government to undertake to pay for damages which were merely incidental to the prosecution of the war. This claim for compensation by this institution for the use of its buildings for hospital purposes for a period of four years by the Government of the United States stands upon entirely different principles. If there is either any law or any moral principle against the propriety of the Government of the United States paying claims like this they are written in some book that I have never read.

This is simply and purely a claim for compensation for the use of this property, and this institution of learning is just as much entitled in law and in morals to be paid a fair rate of compensation as any person in any other part of the country would have been had the Government used his property for that purpose. The confederate government never had any control of this property. The Government of the United States took possession of Alexandria and the surrounding country, I believe, a day or two after the passage of the ordinance of secession by the State of Virginia, and before that State had become a part of the confederate government. That portion of the territory of Virginia in which the cemetery is situated was recognized by the Government of the United States during the entire war as loyal territory. It was represented in the Senate of the United States during the entire war, and during a portion of the war at least it was represented in this House.

Mr. LATHROP. I desire to ask the gentleman if he ever heard of a nation blockading its own ports?

Mr. EDEN. It never was in the possession of the confederate government. It was in our possession and could not be blockaded; it never was in the possession of the confederate government at any time.

Mr. LATHROP. I never heard of a people blockading against themselves; but there was a blockade there against the enemy.

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman from Michigan puts this upon the ground that the Government of the United States had captured that property, had captured the city of Alexandria, including this high-school, and all the property there. Well, if the Government of the United States had captured that property, and intended to hold it and own it as captured property, I suppose that the rights of individuals would have been entirely dispensed with, and all the inhabitants of that territory, after the war was over, before they could again reoccupy their lands and houses, would have been compelled to buy them from the Government of the United States. No one ever heard of such a law as that.

Again, this is not setting a precedent; the payment of the rent for this seminary is not making a precedent. The precedent has already been made, was made soon after the close of the war, and I do not know but during the war, and has been followed from that time until this. The Government of the United States has paid for the rent of property held as this property was in Tennessee and in Kentucky, and probably in other States of the Union, to which I do not now have time to refer.

Mr. CONGER. Was not that by special contract?

Mr. EDEN. I am not aware that there was any special contract in those cases. But in this case, as I understand from the report, Surgeon-General Barnes advised the payment for this property, and it would have been paid without any additional legislation but for the fact that in 1867 an act of Congress was passed which forbade the payment of any claims in the seceded States without action of Congress. Consequently that act prevented this institution from receiving what the Department was willing to pay, and what it would have paid but for the law that forbade the payment of claims in all that territory.

In the treatment of the people in the late insurrectionary States, and in the treatment of their property, the Government of the United States has not proceeded upon the theory laid down by the gentleman from Michigan. The Government has not proceeded upon the theory that all property that was captured in that country belonged to the Government of the United States and that the Government had no right to pay for it because it had captured it.

At the close of the late war we had a large amount of what was denominated in the law as captured and abandoned property; some $24,000,000. A large part of the proceeds of that captured and abandoned property has been paid into the Treasury of the United States. This Congress passed an act giving the claimants upon that fund the right to sue in the Court of Claims, and if they could identify their property they were allowed to recover the proceeds of it.

Mr. CONGER. This House passed such an act; not this Congress.

Mr. EDEN. It became the law of the land; it was an act of Congress, and it became the law of the land many years ago. A large part of that property has been recovered under that law.

Now, I am as much opposed to the payment of unlawful claims as my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] or anybody else. As a member of this House and as a member of the Committee on War Claims, in my dealings with this question I have been as careful and as cautious as probably any gentleman upon this floor. But when the Government has had the use of a valuable property in its own territory, under its own jurisdiction, never under the jurisdiction of the enemy, for a period of four years, I say that instead of its being unlawful to pay for the use of that property, it is disgraceful for the Government to refuse to pay for it.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, addressed the committee. [His remarks will be printed in the Appendix.]

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, as one of the members of the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred this bill for its consideration, it became my duty to investigate somewhat the nature of the claim and to cast my vote in the committee for or against the passage of the bill. I believe in the justice of the claim, in its equity, in its right. I do not see that it is in any sense a war claim; and in reply to my friend from Pennsylvania, who says he fails to distinguish between the case of William and Mary and the case of the Episcopal Seminary at Alexandria, I will say that in the one case the College of William and Mary was on territory belonging to and under the control of the Confederate States, and it was destroyed by one of the exigencies of war.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Allow me to recall the gentleman's attention to the report made by the same gentleman from Virginia who made this report. He states that this territory was under the control of the United States at the time it was occupied.

Mr. HASKELL. Very good. It was destroyed as one of the exigencies or one of the casualties of war. It afforded the confederate service no protection and no benefit. It gave the Union side no protection and no benefit. It was destroyed as much by one of the accidents of war as the destruction of a building destroyed by a stroke of lightning can be termed an accident. This building was located in Alexandria, a section of the country which by proclamation of the President of the United States was declared to be part of the United States and not part of the confederacy. These buildings were not destroyed by one of the accidents of war. There is no claim to pay for the destruction of this building. There is no claim here to pay for the destruction of any furniture. This was a piece of territory declared by the President of the United States to be part of our territory and not part of the confederacy. By order of our own officers these buildings were appropriated to the use of the Union soldiers. For four long years Union soldiers were protected by the roofs of these buildings. Every friend of the Union soldier who knew his friend was there felt he was provided with comfortable hospital accomodations.

Now, then, these buildings constructed by the gratuitous gift of loyal men, this institution was in no sense disloyal, in no way allied to the confederate service.

These buildings have escaped all the exigencies of the war, and are at present in possession of the same old company, and this claim is pending before Congress to pay for the valuable services which the Union soldiers received from an entirely lawful and legal corporation.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Early in the war the United States took possession of the city of Nashville; they took possession of the churches, the colleges, the court-house, and other public buildings, and they used them for hospitals. The whole city was a military camp for years, and now what good reason is there if the Government pays this claim why it should not also pay for the rent of those buildings?

Mr. HASKELL. I do not know.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Neither do I.

Mr. HASKELL. I do not know what good reason a church or building occupied by Union soldiers in the city of Nashville, a loyal institution, no charge of disloyalty attaching to the owner; affording protection and shelter and convenience to Union troops by order of officers of our Army—I say I do not see any good reason why it should not be paid for. I suppose there may be some good reason, but I do not know it.

But I am not alone in the advocacy of this bill. The payment of this rent has been asked for by a republican and a Union Secretary of War. The payment of this rent has been asked for by a loyal Union Surgeon-General. A similar institution has been paid under a similar bill. I am not in favor of any war claim. I apprehend it is not necessary for a representative of the State of Kansas to vote against anything anybody may suggest as a war claim in order to prove his devotion and loyalty to the Union or to the republican party. I am a citizen and a resident of the town that was destroyed by one of these accidents of war. I know exactly what it cost. No, I do not want to be paid, but if I shall come here with a legitimate bill and ask for nothing but what is right and just and equitable, I hope the American Congress, republican or democratic, will forego for a moment all petty considerations and deal in the spirit of that great higher law which commands us to do unto others as we would that others should do unto us.

I cannot conceive wherein this is a war claim. I take it this in no way binds me to vote for war claims. I would not cast my vote for one on any consideration. I conceive, however, these buildings used by our troops, affording valuable aid, ought to have a moderate rent allowed for them, especially when the institution and the very soil upon which it stands, by the word of a republican Union President of the United States, was declared not to be within the lines of the rebellion.

Mr. HUNTON rose.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I would like, if the gentleman from Virginia would allow me, to ask the gentleman who has just finished a question for information.

Mr. HUNTON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Does the gentleman from Kansas know who were the officers of this institution?

Mr. HASKELL. I do not.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Has the gentleman any knowledge as to whether they were loyal?

Mr. HASKELL. The officers?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The officers of this institution.

Mr. HASKELL. Some were loyal and some were not, as I understand.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Does the gentleman know who was the presiding officer of the institution?

Mr. HASKELL. The president now is Cassius M. Lee. I cannot recall the name of the president at that time.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. What was the objection in the way of the Secretary of War paying for the use of this building?

Mr. HASKELL. I cannot recall at present the terms of the objection.

Mr. GOODE. If the gentleman from New York will allow me I will answer him upon that point. If he has paid attention to the reading of the report——

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I have not; I was out when the report was read.

Mr. GOODE. I will be glad, then, to state, with the permission of my friend from Kansas, that after the termination of the war a claim for the rent of this building was brought under the attention of Surgeon-General Barnes, and he recommended its payment. Application was made to the Secretary of War and he directed the bill to be paid as one which ought to be paid because it was reasonable and just. Then his attention was called to the law of 1867, prohibiting the payment of any claim arising in the seceded States; he therefore declined payment and recommended that application be made to Congress.

Mr. HUNTON. If there ever was a claim which came before this House that ought to be received and treated without any sectional feeling, this is such a claim; and I am gratified, Mr. Chairman, that up to this period no sort of sectional feeling has been introduced into the debate upon this bill which comes before the House reported by one of its committees with unanimity, as I understand. Gentlemen from the North and the South and the East and the West have all, by uniting in that report, said to this committee, this is one of the claims pending before this House that ought to be paid because it is just.

Let us look a moment at this claim, Mr. Chairman, and see how it presents itself before this House and to the minds of the members of the committee who have to vote upon it. It is the claim of the Virginia Theological Seminary and High School. There were seventeen buildings used by the two institutions under one government, for the education of ministers of the Gospel and the preparation of young men for the colleges and the higher schools of the country. These seventeen buildings were erected by funds contributed throughout the length and breadth of the land. This institution owed its rise and its success to no one section of this land, but as far as the Episcopal Church was known in the United States it received funds for its endowment. We learn by the report what I knew before, that one of these buildings was erected by funds furnished by William H. Aspinwall & Brother, of New York; another by John Bohlen and his sister, of Philadelphia; and still another by the congregation of Saint George's church, New York; and the residue of the fund was furnished from all parts of this land.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] asked the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] a question as to where the officers of this institution owed their allegiance, to which government they adhered. I unfortunately cannot answer the gentleman except as to one of the officers of that institution whom I knew and loved, who spent many days in my house, and was esteemed and beloved by my family. I refer to Rev. James May, of Philadelphia, one of the leading officers of that institution. When this college was taken possession of as a hospital building by the Army of the United States, that pious and excellent gentleman returned to his home in the city of Philadelphia, and died there during the war.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in this theological seminary according to the statement in the report, which is unquestionably true, up to 1874 there had been educated 601 students of divinity. They were not students of the South; they were not students of any given section of this great country, but they came from every section—North, South, East, and West. I find that of these there were 200 from the North, 195 from the South, 19 foreigners, and 187 whose residence is not given in the catalogue. Now, sir, what has become of those 601 students of divinity? These men entered the holy ministry. They were not preachers of the South alone but they scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land, preaching the Gospel to the people of Michigan as well as to the people of Virginia. Of this number of 601 students, 440 still remain in the ministry, and they are in thirty-two States of this Union and in foreign lands preaching the Gospel; 31 have gone to foreign lands as missionaries; 44 are laboring in Maryland, 56 in Pennsylvania, 34 in New York, and the rest are scattered in smaller numbers in other States of the Union.

Such is the institution for the rent of whose buildings this bill is pressed before this committee, and I say, as I said at the outset of my remarks, if there ever was a claim before the Congress of the United States that ought to be treated in a non-sectional spirit, this is such a claim. And I say, sir, that while the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has opposed this claim, he has stated to the committee that he opposed it, not because it comes from Virginia or the South, but because he believed it is one of those claims coming from anywhere that ought not to be paid. I cannot take exception to any such position. If the gentleman believes it should not be paid, let him vote according to his sentiments. I must say, however, that I cannot conceive the process of reasoning by which the gentleman arrived at such a conclusion.

Why ought this claim to be paid? Why is it distinguishable from those other claims which this committee has over and over again rejected? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] said it seemed strange that gentlemen should vote against William and Mary college and support this bill. Why, sir, it does not seem strange to me.

I do not mean to express any approbation of the action of this committee in rejecting the claim of William and Mary. On the contrary, I believe that that claim ought to have been paid; but this claim rests upon higher ground, and does not present any phase of the question involved in the payment of William and Mary.

William and Mary was an ex delicto claim. It was a payment for the destruction of property in the exigencies of war. This is a claim ex contractu for the payment of rent and property occupied by the United States Government as a hospital, and if gentlemen cannot see any difference between this claim and that one I must confess that I am surprised.

The one claim is for the destruction of buildings by the exigencies of war, while this claim is for payment for the use and occupation ex contractu, and for rent of property occupied by the United States Government as a hospital for its soldiers.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Would not that apply to every public building occupied by the Union Army throughout the South?

Mr. HUNTON. Every building occupied by the Army of the United States in Union territory ought to have been and in many cases has been paid for.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Was this Union territory?

Mr. HUNTON. I will show you that this was Union territory.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. That is not admitted.

Mr. HUNTON. I will prove that it was so.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Take, for instance, the city of Nashville. It was not Union territory when the Government took possession of the city, and they occupied almost every public building there. And if they have a right to claim pay for the occupation of this building, pay may be claimed for every one of those buildings in Nashville, and also for the buildings in New Orleans and where the ex contractu. Is not that true?

Mr. COX, of New York. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, I will ask whether or not the territory in which these buildings were situated was not by proclamation of the President declared to be loyal territory? That is the main point.

Mr. HUNTON. I was about to state that. This property is situated one mile from the town of Alexandria, and was never for twenty-four hours under the control of the confederate government after the ordinance of secession was adopted. I believe I am right in saying this, certainly not for more than one night after the adoption of the ordinance of secession by the State of Virginia.

The Federal forces took possession of Alexandria, and I believe of this college, and held it until the close of the war.

The territory in which this building is situated was in the possession, the undisturbed permanent possession, of the Federal Government during the late war.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Was the city of Nashville?

Mr. HUNTON. If that be true, the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that such permanent occupation as this made the territory as much a part of the territory of the United States as Massachusetts or New York.

Mr. MILLS. If my friend from Virginia will allow me, I will say that on this matter of contracts the Attorney-General of the United States has decided in a written opinion that the law of 1867, which has been quoted, does not apply to contracts at all, and he rendered an opinion, which I believe will be found in the twelfth volume of the Opinions of the Attorneys-General, sustaining a contract made by the Government with a rebel in the State of Virginia for furnishing wood to a railroad occupied then by the Government. The court held that the act had no reference to contracts made by the Government, and that all contracts must be carried out, no matter whether they were made with rebels or not.

Mr. HUNTON. The decision to which I desired to refer when I was interrupted was in the case of The Planters' Bank vs. The Union Bank of New Orleans. The Supreme Court decided that when the city of New Orleans was taken possession of by the Federal troops and held by them permanently to the close of the war, this occupation of itself placed the people of that city and its property under the protection of the flag of the Union.

Now this is not only true as to the city of Alexandria and the territory embracing the buildings for which rent is asked, but the President in his proclamation expressly exempted this territory from the operation of the proclamation which declared that rebellion existed in certain portions of the country.

Sir, look at this question in any way you may, in any phase you may, and no man in my opinion can maintain on this floor that these buildings were in territory at that time at war with the United States. They were in territory subject to the dominion and laws of the United States, and its people and its property were as much entitled to the protection of the Government of the United States as were the people of any State in the Union.

That is not all, sir. All through the four years of the unhappy war that waged between these sections there was a Legislature of the State of Virginia which was denominated on this side of the river the loyal Legislature of Virginia.

That Legislature held its sessions at first in the city of Wheeling, and when West Virginia was taken from the old Commonwealth that Legislature removed to the city of Alexandria.

Mr. TUCKER. In May, 1863.

Mr. HUNTON. And held its sessions in the city of Alexandria from that time until the close of the war, when it went to the city of Richmond and became the Legislature of the whole State, and was recognized by the whole State as its lawful Legislature.

Mr. CASWELL. To which State government did this locality pay taxes?

Mr. HUNTON. To what was known on this side of the river as the "loyal" State government of Virginia, holding its sessions in the city of Alexandria.

That is not all. This very territory, embracing these very buildings, was represented in that Legislature in the city of Alexandria, and that Legislature sent Senators from the State of Virginia who occupied seats in the other branch of the legislative department of this Government. And this very territory, embracing these buildings, helped to elect members of this House who took their seats here during the war.

Mr. RYAN. Was not that by force of arms? Did we not by force of arms carry our authority and laws over that territory as hostile territory? In other words, I wish to ask the gentleman if the confederate arms had prevailed instead of the Federal arms, whether as the Confederate States were then organized this territory would not have been embraced within the jurisdiction of the Confederate States?

Mr. HUNTON. I presume it would. But while it was in the permanent possession of the Federal Government it was entitled to the protection of the Federal laws both as to persons and to property.

Mr. TUCKER. And entitled to the protection of the Constitution.

Mr. HUNTON. Yes. Another thing which strikes my mind——

Mr. ELLSWORTH. That applies anywhere where we had possession?

Mr. HUNTON. Where you had permanent possession.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HUNTON. And in this case the possession never ceased until the whole southern country, including the whole State of Virginia, recognized the United States laws and the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HUNTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to inquire whether this same territory was not represented in the confederate legislature of Virginia and in the confederate congress?

Mr. HUNTON. I think not.

Mr. GOODE. It was not.

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague says positively that it was not. Now, if this was Federal territory, subject to Federal laws and jurisdiction, I ask this committee if the Constitution does not guarantee to these claimants here payment for the use of their property? I call the attention of the committee to the fifth amendment of the Constitution, which provides that—

> No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

There is no question that this was private property, or that it was taken for public use. And if it was under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government it is the bounden duty of the Government to pay rent for this property. It had no right to take this property, being private property, for public use without just compensation.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Does the gentleman claim that that applies in case of war?

Mr. HUNTON. It applies where the Federal Government had jurisdiction; as much in this case as in any portion of the district which you represent.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. It does not apply in case of war.

Mr. HUNTON. This case is not without precedents. The Kentucky University was taken possession of and occupied by the forces of the United States, and it was paid for by an act of Congress. The farm of Colonel Joseph Segar, situated away down yonder in Virginia near Hampton, was paid for by law of Congress. The use of the fair grounds at Lexington, Kentucky, was paid for on the same principle. Why the rent of this property should be excepted out of the precedents already established by this House I cannot for the life of me see.

This question has been before different Departments of this Government several times since the war closed. Soon after the close of the war these parties presented their claim to the Secretary of War. They did not present it for rent alone. While the Federal soldiers held possession of these buildings for hospital purposes they destroyed very nearly all the property that was in these seventeen buildings; most of it was new. That was not all. They cut and used the timber from thirty acres of land belonging to this institution, which furnished fuel for that portion of the Army of the United States.

When this claim was presented to the Secretary of War it contained not only a claim for rent for the occupation of these buildings, but a claim for the destruction of the furniture and for the destruction of the timber on the thirty acres of land. The Surgeon-General of the United States, General Barnes, indorsed the entire claim as just and right, and said it ought to be paid.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That was in violation of law, was it not?

Mr. HUNTON. This claim was presented to the Secretary of War with the indorsement of Surgeon-General Barnes. The Secretary of War said he did not feel authorized by existing law to pay for the destruction of property or the destruction of the timber. He said that if they would strike out those items from the account he would pay the rest. They went back and reformed their account, and again presented it. The Secretary of War was then informed that by the law of 1867 he was prohibited from paying any such claims as this, and for that reason alone he did not pay it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I maintain that while the law of 1867 was technically a prohibition upon the Secretary of War to pay this claim, yet, according to the equity of this case, he was as much bound to pay it as to pay any claim for rent for any building in the United States occupied by Federal troops during the war; because, though this institution was within the boundaries of a seceding State according to the phraseology of the law of 1867, it was in that portion of the State of Virginia which the President of the United States declared was not in rebellion, which belonged to the Government of the United States, and was entitled to its protection so far as concerned both person and property.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RYAN. I understood the gentleman to state that there was a contract to pay this rent. Do I understand him to say that there was an express contract, or is it claimed that the occupancy by the Government raises an implied contract to pay for such use?

Mr. HUNTON. I said that this is a claim ex contractu, while the case of William and Mary was ex delicto. I do not mean to assert, and I trust I have not asserted, that there was an express contract between the parties as to the payment of rent. But we all know, and it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, that the Government of the United States is as thoroughly and completely bound by an implied contract of this sort as by an express one.

Mr. RYAN. I was led to ask the question because of the reply which the gentleman from Virginia made to the question put by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.] There was some misunderstanding on this side of the House in regard to the gentleman's position, and hence I asked this question for information.

Mr. HUNTON. I certainly did not mean to say, and did not wish to be understood as saying, that there was an express contract between the Government and the trustees of this institution for the payment of rent. But in the late case of Clark vs. The United States, reported in 2 Otto, the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the Government of the United States was bound by its implied contract as well as by an express contract.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I have stated this case fairly, (and I have labored to do so,) I ask what is there surrounding the case that should cause a single member of this committee to hesitate one moment to pay for the rent of these buildings occupied by the United States Government as a hospital for its troops? They were occupied by order of the Government—by order of one of its surgeons; and they were not surrendered until that surgeon or his successor decided to abolish the hospital. When this institution, built as I have said for the purpose of sending preachers all over this land, comes here and asks for payment, not for property destroyed, not for furniture carried away or destroyed, not for the thirty acres of wood, most valuable to the institution—when this institution is willing to relinquish any claim for these matters as belonging possibly to the exigencies of war—when it comes here and simply asks the Congress of the United States to pay what the buildings were worth as shelter for sick soldiers of the Union Army, I cannot see how the Representatives of this Government can hesitate to pay such a claim.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, distinguishing this case from that of William and Mary college, I shall support this bill. The discussion to-day has recalled some of the earliest memories of my public life, at least in connection with national affairs. I had been elected to Congress in October, 1860; and from the 4th of March, 1861, when President Lincoln was inaugurated, until the 4th of July of the same year, when Congress assembled upon his call, I spent much of the time in Washington, especially after the 19th of April. Listening to the discussion to-day as to whether the city of Alexandria was hostile or Union territory, I could not help remembering that I was oftentimes an almost daily visitor to Alexandria; that a short time after the assassination of Colonel Ellsworth and the killing of his murderer, Jackson, I addressed from the window of an engine-house the citizens of Alexandria as a Union man, and was kindly received by them.

I remember, too, the carrying of wounded troops to this hospital and when its buildings were filled, the erection of frame barrack hospitals which covered gradually acre after acre until they themselves made a great city of the sick and dying. When public duty or that duty of a semi-public nature which had brought me to Washington would permit, it was my privilege to visit those hospitals; and some of my most devoted friends in the State of Pennsylvania to-day are men whom I found there, then unknown to me but who would send a messenger to me or would feebly respond when I would ask whether there was any Philadelphia soldiers there. I could name some of them if it were necessary.

I remember, too, Mr. Chairman, that Congress has taken action on cases of this kind when there were no Representatives from the confederacy on this floor—before we had so many confederate brigadiers in the Halls of Congress. We paid Joseph Segar, who for a time occupied a seat as a member of this House, if I remember rightly, and was returned from what was called the loyal government of Virginia as Senator of Virginia with Mr. Bowden as his colleague. They did not take their seats, but I remember a good deal of pleasant intercourse with them. We paid, too, Mr. Armes, and but for an unfortunate inability to recall the name I think I could give some others. The cases of Segar and Armes I remember distinctly. The records will show in what year it was these loyal citizens, one of Alexandria and the other of Williamsburgh, were reimbursed by a Congress overwhelmingly republican.

Again, I remember an immense number of buildings that the Government rented under special contracts in Alexandria. The Quartermaster's Department occupied them, together with the commissary and other branches of the military service; and I can make no distinction between the propriety of paying rent for these seventeen buildings, which for four years gave comfortable shelter to the wounded and sick and dying of our Army, and any other building the Government occupied in and about that city for which it paid rent.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I would vote for the payment of this claim, Mr. Chairman, as readily, it being in the territory of Virginia, as I would if it were in any other territory. I opposed the payment of the claim of William and Mary college for reasons which I then expressed to the committee. It will be remembered by such members of this House as were members of the Forty-fourth Congress that I voted to pay the claim of Van Hoffman and his partner for the rent of their mill at Alexandria under an arrangement with the Commissary-General. But the element which made me vote for that Van Hoffman claim I find wanting in this case. I voted as I did in that instance because it was established beyond peradventure that Van Hoffman and his partner were, during every day of the war, loyal citizens; but there is an utter absence here of any positive proof that the ruling power of this corporation was loyal—that this corporation and the controlling power of Fairfax Episcopal Seminary was loyal. I know that Bishop Johns, the bishop of Virginia, under whose auspices this institution was and whose residence was at its very door, cast in his fortunes with the confederacy and gave his influence and his power in favor of the opponents of the Government.

I stand in this case as I would in any other case, and I do not think our sentiments had better run away with us, even though it happened to us as to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who had the kindly feelings of his heart touched to see some of his neighbors' boys there lying down to die at Fairfax Seminary in consequence of wounds received in fighting against the rebellion. I went there, too, in December, 1861, and I saw some very good and excellent friends there. It was an occasion long to be remembered. But the occupants of the seminary were not there. It was in the Union lines. It was under the protection of the Union guns. There was not even a seminarial rat on the grounds. [Laughter.] I went through the seminary buildings and they were utterly vacant so far as its officers and students were concerned. Where had they gone? If the Union Government and the Union soldiers were their friends, how happened it they ran away from them?

Mr. GOODE. If the gentleman will refer to the military orders issued from the Army of the Potomac he will find that on August 28, 1861, this institution could not possibly be occupied at that time as a seminary, because it had been taken and appropriated for hospital purposes.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. What was the date?

Mr. GOODE. August 28, 1861. And as to Bishop Johns, the president of the seminary, he went, when it was taken in charge under that military order, to another portion of his diocese, where he remained and discharged the duties incumbent upon his office of bishop of Virginia, having nothing to do with the war.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I do not find fault with Bishop Johns for joining the confederacy. I do not find fault with the gentlemen here representing the States which went into rebellion. I do not stand here to find fault with anybody who went into the rebellion, whether he be bishop or layman. It makes no difference. Those who cast their lot in the confederacy adopted in taking their choice all that resulted from it. Those who cast in their lot with the Union took their choice and they took with that choice all the advantages that resulted from it, and time has shown they have taken all the burdens that resulted from their choice; and God only knows when those burdens will cease being piled on them. If we knew what we had to carry we should feel better about it. But there is one approach, and another approach, and another and another. Yesterday we had a warning from over yonder [Mr. ELLIS, of Louisiana] that some one had a claim of $82,000,000 against us, and that we must be ready to "shell out." We must pay that when the time comes and must pay everything else.

Now, I am not to find any fault with Bishop Johns. His religion, as he construed his duty, required him to go into the confederacy, and Bishop Johns must take the consequences.

Mr. GOODE. He is in heaven now.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I hope he is, and I believe many of those who were for the confederacy will go to heaven and to the best part of it. They were dreadfully mistaken; they had a tough time of it here and I hope they will go in future where they will have better luck. [Laughter.] I hope I will meet my friend from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] there, and we will not then hear any more about rebel claims, or about claims under a violated "Constitution." [Laughter.] The only claim of our friends from the confederacy will then be for mercy; it will not come under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I put my objection to this bill on the very ground on which I rested my action when I voted for the claim of Van Hoffman. I then said if a claimant is shown to have been loyal I will pay, if not loyal I will not pay. I am not going to pay this claim because northern men contributed to build up this seminary. We took from the Treasury of the Union money to build the court-houses and custom-houses in what were afterward the Confederate States, and some of that money of course came from the North. But that did not vary the circumstances of the case. They were just as rebellious in those neighborhoods although the money which built their custom-houses and their light-houses and court-houses came partly from the North; it made no odds whatever that the North had contributed, as I trust the North ever will contribute what it properly should contribute for our brethren of the South, however much they may get angry or fly into a passion, or however much we may fly into a passion; for I want to have it understood that if there is to be any passion about it, while I am in public life there will be as much passion on my side as on theirs. [Laughter.] For half a century before the late war we never got into a passion on our side; but I now say to gentlemen on both sides of this House, "Be ye angry and sin not."

A MEMBER. But you must not let the sun go down upon your wrath.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. That applies only to night sessions, after the sun has gone down. In day sessions it is right to be angry all the time. [Laughter.]

I cannot and will not vote for this bill until it is established beyond peradventure that the influence of this corporation was in the right direction. I had one friend in that seminary, and I know he considered then and considers now that it was the providence of God that enabled him to get off to the North with his life.

Let me say also that I envy the people of Alexandria the privilege they had of hearing my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY;] of hearing his beautiful voice ringing out on the night air in favor of the Union. But my friend will not forget that he had our New York Zouaves to protect him. [Laughter.] But for our New York Zouaves all that beautiful flow of eloquence would have been lost to the world.

Does any man believe that with the spirit prevailing there—with the spirit prevailing which stimulated Jackson to murder the gallant Ellsworth—it would have been allowed to my eloquent friend to speak in favor of the Union in Alexandria unless he had been protected by the guns of the Ellsworth Zouaves? We know it was rebel territory at one time. Virginia had declared itself out of the Union, and however void that declaration might be held to be under the Constitution, that was forgotten then, but it is vividly remembered now when there is money to be got. However the matter was afterward, there was a time when this territory was a part of a rebel State and in the power of that State.

But I do not put my objection simply on that ground. I know that our troops took possession. Our troops finally got possession of the whole confederacy down at Appomattox, but that did not wipe out the rebellion. It wiped out the fighting on the field, but only prepared us for that long, protracted, never-ending fight at the doors of the Treasury that began immediately after Appomattox, and God knows when that battle will end. No, sir, I put my opposition to the bill upon the ground that the influence of this institution was, up to the day and after the day when Virginia went out, in the wrong direction.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, perhaps it is proper that as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor I should say a word in advocacy of this bill. I heartily approve the bill and shall most cheerfully vote for its passage. I propose to give several reasons in brief why I shall vote for the bill. I do not propose to refine upon the technicalities of the law, to quibble upon the ninth part of a hair whether it is a contract express or a contract implied, or whether it is no contract. The vital point in the matter is that here was private property, the property of a corporation to be sure, but it was, nevertheless, property the Government used. It derived a benefit from the use, and according to all principles of law, public and private, and the higher principles of equity and morality, when the Government has received the benefit of it, it should recognize that benefit by a just compensation. There are principles that tower like a monument in the plains of jurisprudence and legislation far above legal technicalities and sectional passions; they are the principles of justice and equity which all nations must recognize to maintain an exalted civilization.

Now, Mr. Chairman, placing it on the high ground of equity and justice, the Government having taken something for nothing the only vindication of its integrity is to make a fair compensation. But we are not without law for the support of this proposition. We have an ancient instrument called the Constitution of the United States. It not only embodies but it regulates the exercise of all the powers of the Government. The President and all civil officers, the Army and the Navy, are restrained by its fetters. It treads the deck of the American man-of-war as high-admiral in the most distant sea and curbs the robust powers of the nation's armies. There is no power which is not covered by its canopy, and there is no escape from its presence in war or in peace.

I wish to restate here distinctly this fundamental idea, and it is time that the American people understood it, that the Constitution is the paramount law of this land, above military law, above the laws of war, and every power and force known to this Government are subject to its control.

The question has been asked, Was not the Constitution suspended or held in abeyance during the existence of the war? By no manner of means. No doctrine could be more monstrous and dangerous to the life, liberty, and property of the people than an army, the most dangerous of all powers, turned loose in unbridled licentiousness upon the country.

Once admit that a state of war suspends the functions of the Constitution, the time may come when that sacred instrument may be trampled in the mire beneath the red hoof of war, and liberty may be strangled with the iron hand of a conqueror who may mount like a Cæsar to a throne. No, Mr. Chairman, the Constitution did not intend to dispense with its obligations in a time of war. But it was intended to go before our armies as the pillar of cloud by day and fire by night; and all those who directed the movement of our armies recognized this theory of the Constitution.

I wish it understood that I am not insisting upon the obligation of the Government to repair losses resulting from the unavoidable casualties of war. It is my purpose to speak to the issue involved in this case.

I now invite attention to this clause of the Constitution:

> No soldier shall in time of peace be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Now let us inquire what was the policy of the Government in relation to the occupancy of private property? If my recollection is not at fault, the President, in the early stages of the war, caused a proclamation to be issued that all private property should be respected, but the property of the Confederate States should be appropriated to the Government. Now, sirs, every officer who maintained the authority of the Constitution and was obedient to the proclamation of the President of the United States recognized this fundamental principle. Here is an extract from the proclamation of that great soldier, General McClellan, when he marched his legions upon the soil of the "Old Dominion," and I call your attention to it:

> I have ordered the troops to cross the river. They come as your friends and brothers, as enemies only to armed rebels, who are preying upon you. Your homes, your families, and your property are safe under our protection.

There was a guarantee; there was a regulation for the Army of the United States; there was no brigandism in it; it was not the tread of the Goths, Vandals, Huns, Lombards, and the savage Norsemen who invaded the plains of Italy. Did this mean a violation of the laws of humanity and of civilization and the spoliation or destruction of the arts and sciences? It was intended to save the country from the historic execration of vandalism.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire did these people accept this guarantee?

Mr. BRIGHT. That is not the question I am now dealing with.

I will call your attention to the authority to which I wish to bring the attention of the House. Here is another authority with reference to the movement of the Army of the West. Here is the proclamation of that great soldier, statesman, publicist, and patriot, General Halleck, who said:

Military stores and public property of the enemy must be surrendered, and any attempt to conceal such property by fraudulent transfer or otherwise will be punished, but no private property will be touched, unless by authority of the commanding general.

It was not to be touched except by order of the commanding general. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, seeing the effect of the Constitution of the United States, that our armies were under it, that they were subordinate to the laws of the land, that private property was to be respected, that the orders of the military authorities guaranteed this protection, and that it could not be touched without authority of law, I come up to the question now before us. Was this property taken by the authority of military orders, or was it violently taken without order? And, so far as that question is concerned, it matters not whether it comes in either shape, the vis major or the superior power; sir, if taken in that way there is another obligation that rushes with constitutional force upon the conscience of the American people.

I call attention to another clause of this old instrument that seems to be moss-grown and forgotten in these days of excitement and sectional strife:

Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Do you inquire whether that was suspended? I tell you no. It was put in the Constitution as a fetter upon the Government. There was a power intended to be reserved to the people, and it was an antagonistic power to the old governments of Europe which had been in the habit of confiscating property by acts of Parliament and without compensation. It was intended to deny and guard against the principles and practices of barbarian nations that seized private property and distributed it as spoils of war among the soldiers. It was intended as a bulwark of the citizen against the rapine and plunder of the Government. Modern nations now pay for all private property taken for purposes of war.

The question comes back to us what are we going to do with these claims? It is a question of power and one easily decided. If you wish to get rid of southern war claims—loyal claims—there is one power and only one power that can absolve the Government from the obligation to pay them, and that is by amending the Constitution and repudiating the claims.

There was an amendment offered in the last Congress for the purpose of changing the Constitution. They had seen that this question would recur as long as this Constitution stood, and it will recur and it will be a bone of contention until the question is settled.

As it stands at present, why should you not pay this claim? It is addressed to the discretion of Congress. We do not legislate for other Congresses; they are not bound by our precedents. As a matter of course, when this question comes to us in that form it is simply one of justice; a question whether you will pay the claim or not. That being the whole question, it appeals from your sectionalism to the Constitution of the nation; it appeals to law and justice and to the higher elements of equity itself.

While I am upon this subject allow me to say a word in all kindness to my northern friends. I have no drops of fire to rain upon them. I am not one to stir the angry passions of sectional strife, nor to fan the fire which is slumbering. I would rather quench than inflame. But I wish to say this to them; they have a grand opportunity to dignify their great triumph with magnanimity and mercy. If they wish the sundered and bleeding limbs of this grand Republic to be entirely healed, if they wish its wounds to be cicatrized, it must be done with the surgery of love and in the higher feeling of justice, and with the recognition of constitutional right. I tell you that you have now an opportunity to vindicate your name, not only before the eyes of the present, but before the opening eyelids of posterity. I tell you that a record is being made just here upon this occasion. There is no law that authorizes the destruction of school-houses and churches and hospitals; none whatever. There is no law of war that authorizes an invasion of the laws of humanity. There is no law of war that authorizes an invasion upon the civilization of the people. There is no law that authorizes the spoliation or destruction of the arts and sciences, which belong not to the present alone, not to one generation, but which belong to the world and to all time. They are not under the caveat of a patent for the present; they belong to posterity. These works are to be entailed upon them, and they are entitled to the inheritance.

The point that I make is this: when we look over the desolate churches and school-houses, these monuments of civilization and the religion of the people; when they appeal to you upon a principle far above sectional strife and the maxims of revenge, that you should rebuild the waste places, the school-houses and churches, and bid them soar heavenward; thereby you will build monuments that will do more to reconcile the people of the North and of the South than any other donation or tribute that you can pay to them. They will stand there for the eye of posterity; they will oft speak that you have been charitable, that you have been benignant, that you have been humane, that you are not subject to the charge of vandalism. Although there have been desolated cities and smoking ruins, and whole districts swept by the fires of war, still so far as this matter is concerned no tribute to the civilization and religion of a people will be more warmly recognized as a return of your love and your benediction, and of your willingness to be restored one to the other; not only to shake hands across the bloody chasm, but to have it healed up and cicatrized so that the wound shall disappear like a wound of the air.

If you wish your country to be one in heart as it is one in government, if you wish the people of the North and of the South to rush again into the arms of each other, make them feel that they have one national heart, the same pulsation, the same grand vital principles sending its life to all the extremities. You have the opportunity now.

But you may make a record, I warn you, that will repel and drive them away from you in their efforts of love. You may draw them to you, and do so at very little cost. You may save your justice, you can save your honor, you can save the Constitution of the United States and command the blessings of posterity when it shall read the record you have made here to-day and perhaps in time yet to come.

If you want peace, let us begin now to rebuild the waste places; bid our churches arise and point their steeples to the skies; bid our institutions of learning arise in their influence throughout all the land. Harvard and Yale and Princeton are just as much cherished in the South as they are at home. They have been the well-springs of our civilization as well as of our learning. The waters have gone forth free until they have overspread this whole land. We desire no hostility, no war, no cry of sectionalism to be raised against them.

This is your common country; it appeals to you as your own country. You cannot inflict an injury upon the South without it recoils upon yourselves. True patriotism and a proper feeling would dictate that the people of the North should have the same pride in relation to the prosperity of the South and its institutions as they have in relation to that of their own section: Massachusetts belongs to me as well as to any other gentleman upon this floor; it is a part of the inheritance of a common liberty; and Louisiana and Virginia belong to you just as much as to the citizens who reside in those States.

While I say this for old Virginia it is not in a spirit of "gush." She has been liberal in her treatment of the West. She opened her treasures and her heart for the purpose of extinguishing the national debt. She has given you a vast domain; and when she comes here now asking for a recognition at your hands shall she, like a beggar of old, say, "A pampered ingrate drove me from the door?" No; remember that you had a mother, ye men of the West; never forget it. Recognize the boon which you have enjoyed; restore estranged feelings; and if you want peace, then Heaven will send the Angel with her brow adorned with her olive crown.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I had desired to say a few words on this bill, but what I had intended to say has been so well and fully expressed by others that I do not know whether I shall be successful in gaining the attention of the committee.

I take it for granted that among lawyers there will be no disputing the proposition that so far as the question of loyalty is concerned the universal principle and rule of law is that loyal territory raises the presumption of loyalty in those who are the occupants of that territory; and the converse of that proposition is equally true. Now, allow me to make a remark in answer to what fell from my friend from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND.] Notwithstanding the fact that he lashes himself occasionally into a tempest of passion, I cannot help still speaking of him as my good-natured friend from New York, because while he prefers the freshening breeze that lashes the surface of the waters into a tempest, even though it may blow mountain-high, rather than that dead-sea stillness which is unmoved by breeze or gale, still, even in his passion, I can trust to the soundness of his judgment and the goodness of his heart, and I know that he will respond to the sentiment which I have uttered and the legal proposition I have announced.

He spoke, Mr. Chairman, of welcoming in mercy those who had swerved from their loyalty to the Union. I hope he will take to himself something of the salutary lesson given by the gentle Portia in her judgment upon the exacting Jew, when she said:

> The quality of mercy is not strained;
> It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
> Upon the place beneath: it is twice bless'd;
> It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes:
> 'Tis mightiest in the mightiest: it becomes
> The throned monarch better than his crown:
> * * * * *
> It is an attribute to God himself,
> And earthly power doth then show likest God's,
> When mercy seasons justice.

I hope the gentleman from New York will bear in mind this just judgment upon an exacting demander.

When the gentleman asks, was this institution loyal, what part of the institution does he mean? Does he mean the insensate buildings which, in the language of the gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. KELLEY,] sheltered the sick and prostrate soldiers of the Union Army? Would you carry the test of loyalty to that extent? Would you ask whether the insensate stones upon which these buildings were founded and the unfeeling timber that was erected over them were loyal to the Government? You took those buildings and used them for the purposes of the Government; and that institution, devoted to learning, now asks simply that the Government of the United States shall remunerate it for the occupancy of the buildings; a claim which was sanctioned by the then Secretary of War, who, I believe, was Mr. Stanton, and by the then President of the United States. If that be so, upon what principle will you now ask that loyalty shall be established in regard to this institution?

Why, sir, let me state a case that occurred before the war claims commission—a commission organized by law for the purpose of ascertaining what loyal citizens of the South could make just claims against the Government for any part of that fund of $34,000,000 which was deposited in your Treasury, not as a fund belonging in general to the United States, but as a specific fund held in trust by the Government, never to be diverted to any other or general purposes of appropriation. The Supreme Court of the United States decided in two cases that came from the State of Mississippi, one the case of McArdle, the other the case of Kline, that where a party makes a claim against the Government the question of loyalty is not to be considered if that party has been embraced in a general amnesty by the President of the United States or in a specific pardon. Yet this claims commission, a subordinate tribunal, invested simply with the power of paying back to the loyal men of the South what was taken from them, undertakes to assert its prerogative as higher than that of the Court of Claims, higher than that of the Supreme Court of the United States—undertakes to say that in all cases coming before this tribunal the fact of loyalty must be established.

It is within my knowledge that in one case before that tribunal the question of loyalty was raised with reference to an infant who at the time of the facts in controversy was only ten years of age. In deciding this question this judicious commission determined that it would take the deposition of this infant of tender years, not to ascertain if she had been disloyal to the Government, but to find out what were her sympathies and feelings during the progress of that war. The commission absolutely went through the farce of sending to the Isle of Man (where the young lady had been removed by her parents) and taking her deposition. Among the questions propounded to her was this: "How were your sympathies during the war of the rebellion?" She answered truthfully, "I had none." Then the question was put: "Did you sympathize with one side more than the other?" "No." "Did you feel rejoiced when Vicksburgh fell?" "I did not know that Vicksburgh had fallen or risen," was her answer. Yet, sir, when these commissioners undertook to determine the question of the justice of this claim they actually decided this infant, thus unconscious of passing events about which she is called upon to testify, so far as her interest in the claim was concerned ought not to be recognized. I think that is running the doctrine of loyalty to a more farcical conclusion than that reached by my distinguished friend from the State of New York. This is all I have to say.

Mr. GOODE. I move the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CONGER. There are amendments to be offered and that motion cannot be submitted so long as an amendment is pending.

Mr. GOODE. I move, then, that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this bill. It has been sufficiently discussed.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MILLS reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report sundry bills with the recommendation that they do pass and one that it be laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution for printing 1,000 copies of the Narrative of the Polaris Expedition for sale by the Public Printer, and a resolution for printing 15,000 extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1877–'78; in which resolutions the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 5315) to restore the records and files in the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western districts of Texas, lately destroyed by fire.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole with the recommendation that they do pass, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 2160) for the relief of the heirs of Samuel P. Todd, deceased, late a purser in the United States Navy; and

A bill (H. R. No. 850) for the relief of Daniel W. Perkins, of East Saginaw, Michigan.

ELLA P. MURPHY.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. No. 1502) for the relief of Ella P. Murphy is reported with amendments.

Mr. SPARKS. Is it in order to move to recommit that bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It is, the previous question not having been demanded.

Mr. SPARKS. Then I make that motion. That bill was acted on adversely by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. CONGER. Not this bill.

Mr. SPARKS. This is the claim of Ella P. Murphy, which is identical with the claim acted on by the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. But it does not embrace what the other claim did.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

Mr. CONGER. It has been already read in the committee.

Mr. SPARKS. And I now ask that it be read in the House.

Mr. CONGER. Then I move the House adjourn, for it is too late to read it.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and twenty-three minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CLARK, of Iowa: The petition of John Dilatush and others, citizens of Johnson County, Iowa, for such amendment of the patent laws as will protect innocent purchasers of patented articles—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. COX, of New York: The petition of J. M. Weddell and others, for back pay under the eight-hour law—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 18, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. W. V. TUDOR, of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, Saint Louis, Missouri.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. FRYE and Mr. McMAHON demanded the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the unfinished business coming over from a former session, which has been interrupted by other subjects temporarily and is the bill known as the Geneva award bill, on which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has seventeen minutes.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. EAMES.]

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Speaker, upon the question of distributing the balance of the Geneva award, with regard to which the committee to which the subject has been referred are nearly equally divided, I desire in connection with my vote to put on record very briefly my reasons for it.

In the report of the committee, the fact to which every member of the House must give his assent is stated, "that in consequence of the appearance upon the high seas of the Alabama and other confederate cruisers, fitted out and sailed from British waters, a large portion of the American commercial marine was speedily transferred to the British flag, while such of our ship-owners and merchants who either preferred or were compelled by circumstances to keep their vessels and cargoes under the flag of their own country, were subjected to the payment of greatly enhanced rates of insurance when they chose to or could insure at all."

This statement of the committee, if not in words, substantially admits that the ships and their cargoes sailing under the American flag were driven from the high seas and the loss which resulted thereby to American citizens was attributable to "the failure of the British government to properly discharge its duties as a neutral, by negligently permitting confederate cruisers to be fitted out, supplied, and sailed from British ports." The committee in this statement are as accurate in fact as they are precise in their language. The American commerce was not driven from the high seas solely by the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah; but if neither of these cruisers had been fitted out from British ports there would not have been any other confederate cruiser afloat to capture and destroy an American ship or cargo. The act of Great Britain, therefore, in regard to the Alabama, the Florida, and Shenandoah was indirectly the occasion of all the damage to American commerce, whether by these or by any other confederate cruiser.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after the war had closed and this Government, in the conflict of arms, had vindicated and established its lawful authority, the great injury which had arisen from the unfriendly acts of a neutral power became a serious question between Great Britain and this country, and threatened the peace of the two countries. Happily this difficulty was averted by the agreement to submit these differences to a peaceful arbitrament. Under this agreement fifteen and one-half millions have been paid by Great Britain to the United States, a portion of which has been distributed under the law of 1874, and with regard to the balance of which we have now before us the propositions of the committee and of the minority of the committee.

How ought this balance to be distributed? is the question which we here, by our votes, are called upon to decide. I propose to answer this question so far as to indicate, in a few words, the reasons for my own vote.

The treaty of Washington was but an agreement between Great Britain and the United States to submit to the arbitrament of the tribunal for which it provided, certain matters of difference between the two governments, involving the interests of this Government and its citizens.

If, therefore, we would act wisely upon the question now before the House, it would be well to keep in mind what, under the treaty of Washington, was submitted to the decision of the Geneva tribunal, and also at the same time not to lose sight of what was the award or decision of that tribunal. In this way we may correctly decide for what the fifteen and one-half millions was awarded, and thus determine to whom it should in equity and justice be distributed.

What, then, was submitted to this tribunal and for what was the $15,500,000 awarded?

This Government submitted in its own behalf certain claims for indirect damages arising from the continuation of the war and for the general injury which had been done to American commerce in the transfer of it to the British flag. These claims for good and sufficient reasons were waived by this Government, and the other claims, of the insurance companies and of American citizens for the destruction of their ships and property, without regard to the loss by any particular confederate cruiser, and for enhanced rates of premium, were left to the consideration and determination of the court of arbitrament.

Some of these claims were admitted and others were rejected by the tribunal, and its final decision was not to divide and apportion the award among those for which they held the British government responsible, but to name under the seventh article of the treaty a sum in gross, and in their award to determine that this sum should be in full satisfaction of all claims referred for decision, with an express notice from this Government that in such event the United States should be at liberty to dispose of this sum in gross, awarded for all claims referred, as in its discretion seemed to be just and in accordance with justice and equity.

In pursuance of this notice, a portion of this fund, under the law of 1874, has been distributed among those who were justly entitled to it, and the balance now held is proposed to be distributed by the bills now pending before the House.

To whom in equity and justice does this balance belong? My reply to this inquiry is, to all American citizens who have actually sustained loss, either directly or indirectly, by the acts of the British government, and that no distinction ought to be made with respect to injuries by cruisers denominated inculpated or exculpated. But for the fitting out of the inculpated cruisers, I repeat, no so-called exculpated cruisers would have been afloat to commit depredations upon the ships and cargoes of American citizens; and therefore, under the submission and award, no distinction ought to be made in the distribution of this balance, but it should be applied upon the broad, just, and equitable principle of reimbursing any loss occasioned by any of the confederate cruisers.

And such seems to be the conclusion to which the committee have come. In general language, they propose to submit to the determination of the court all claims without distinction, and to leave it to the court upon the facts and according to equity and justice to determine for what and to whom, whether citizen or insurance company, the money shall be paid for damages actually sustained either by inculpated or exculpated cruisers, or by the payment of war premiums to insure American ships and cargoes against loss by these cruisers.

And yet there seems to be a doubt whether the bill of the committee does not in fact exclude a large portion of such claims from the consideration of the court.

Why not, then, remove this doubt by the exact language which will make the duty of the court in this respect clear and plain?

The speech the other day of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BICKNELL,] in favor of the bill of the committee, from his standpoint demonstrated that only those who had suffered loss by the so-called inculpated cruisers had, under the bill of the committee, any legal or equitable claim upon this fund for the losses which they had sustained; while the equally clear argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STENGER,] who is of the committee reporting the pending bill, established the fact that the court to which the distribution is referred could consider all claims presented, and without regard to whether the damage occasioned was by the payment of war premiums or was by an inculpated or an exculpated cruiser.

As between these conflicting views with regard to the bill reported by the committee, it seems to me that it would be prudent and wise to give to the court such specific directions that no class of claimants having actually suffered loss, either directly or indirectly, by the act of the British government shall be excluded from participating in the distribution of this fund. Such direction would be not only consistent with the submission to the Geneva tribunal, but in exact accord with the award which that tribunal made, as well as with the expressed purpose, in case of an award in gross, of this Government to distribute the fund as to it seemed equitable and just.

And as a member of this House who believes that no distinction should be made between American citizens who, directly or indirectly, by the act of the British government have suffered actual loss, either by the inculpated or the exculpated confederate cruisers or by the payment of war premiums, I think it just and wise that such specific direction should be given to the court.

Such direction in no true sense interferes with the judicial power as limited in the Constitution of the United States. It merely names the classes of claimants who have a right to present their claims as entitled to a part of this fund, and with reference to such claimants leaves the court upon the facts to determine the persons entitled to it and the amount of their claims.

With these views upon the pending question, I shall vote for the proposition of the minority of the committee.

The principle which underlies their proposition, as I understand it, is to distribute this fund among actual sufferers, either directly or indirectly, by the negligent act of the British government. And the bill of the minority provides by specific directions for the distribution of the balance among those who have actually suffered loss. It provides for the equitable distribution of the fund, and because it does, it ought to receive, and I hope it will receive, the approval of the House.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, the debate on the Geneva award bill has run along and has been full and complete, and now it is more important an early vote shall be reached than anything else. Therefore I shall not, as I originally proposed, undertake to make any elaborate speech, but will only call attention of members to certain points which in the interval since the last discussion may have somewhat floated away from their minds.

It is really, sir, a contest between the insurance companies of the great cities and the parties upon whom unrelieved losses fell by reason of the depredation of confederate cruisers. The Alabama and her sister cruisers drove from the seas a prosperous American commerce.

It declined from year to year; men who persisted in maintaining their ships under the American flag found their property depreciating from day to day, and that competition with the English ships was growing more and more, so that when the war ended the owners of the American commercial marine were struck down. It was a prostrate interest, and one of the grievances at that time uppermost in the American mind was against Great Britain because she had afforded opportunity to those cruisers to do this damage.

During the time when this interest was growing more and more prostrate under the conditions of the war, there was another interest that grew up and blossomed almost like Jonah's gourd, in a night, and that was the marine-insurance interest. It thrived upon the losses of the community. It was like an undertaker, who is most prosperous when pestilence stalks abroad, and the insurance business of these marine companies was as much built up during the war and made a prosperous business upon the one side, as was the ruin of the shipowners and the freighters on the other side.

Now, when the war ended this grievance in the mind of the American citizen was prosecuted by our State Department, representing our citizens, from time to time, against the British government. We had more than one treaty; the Johnson-Clarendon treaty and the other treaty that was negotiated but never acted upon. From year to year after the war the grievance against Great Britain in the mind of the American people grew so that at last wise and thoughtful men believed that out of it might at any time come a war.

Now I ask anybody who is inclined here to vote for the majority bill—which, as my friend from New York said the other day, is a clean bill for the insurance companies, and nothing else—I ask anybody here who is inclined to vote that way to put to himself this question, whether at that time any portion of the American people, or any large portion of the American people, was pushing for a settlement with Great Britain with the idea that war might arise if this thing was not settled; whether anybody at that time was prosecuting this thing in favor of the insurance companies. Was there any danger, Mr. Speaker, that America and Great Britain would go to war because of the insurance companies, which had grown rich in consequence of the war, which had erected enormous buildings and had paid higher salaries and greater dividends from year to year? Was it for them negotiations were set on foot and all the powers of diplomacy brought to bear to settle this great international question? Why, sir, if at that time anybody had been told this fund was to go to add to the increased stores of the insurance companies the American people would have ceased to take a particle of interest in the controversy and we never would have heard of it again. The Geneva tribunal was not set afoot because the American people believed there might be war unless the insurance companies were paid; but the sufferers all along the coast, in every State, which had built and owned ships, the American citizens impoverished by the acts of these cruisers, were the men behind this agitation and the people for whom the Government interposed.

So we got the tribunal and the award, and at once the insurance companies come to the surface on the right, as they claim, of subrogation. Now, Mr. Speaker, that does not apply here. I cannot go into a legal discussion on this subject, for I have not time. It has been gone over very thoroughly in this Congress and in other Congresses. The insurance companies claim a legal right to be substituted if they paid for the ships or their damages to the rights of the insured. Now, if they have got any right under subrogation, it is a clean, bare, unrelieved, technical legal right. All insurance lawyers know that subrogation is a right which is defined and complete in law, of such a nature that the insurance companies may go into the courts and maintain and enforce it.

Now, if the insurance companies have any rights that are complete as legal rights, why have they not been in the courts? The answer is they must have congressional legislation to let them into the courts; that is the position they are in now. There is no right of subrogation, no right of insurance companies which they can maintain unless Congress gives them the right. We are now confronted with the request that we give them the right which in private cases they get as a technical legal right; and that brings up the whole question of our duty in regard to this fund.

On this question of the legal technical right there is a broader view than any court can take. I maintain here freely and boldly when I am asked if I am afraid to send this question to the courts that there are some subject-matters that are of a broader scope and nature than should be dealt with simply by a court. The right of subrogation is claimed here. Why, sir, it would not be any more absurd if in case of a vessel that had been wrecked or damaged and paid for or repaired by the insurance company the insurance company should claim it had a right to the medal given to the master of that ship for gallant conduct. This is a thing that does not come under any legal right attaching it to the act of the vessel or to the act of the insurance company. This is a great, broad political question. Why, sir, let me give an illustration. When the war ended a very large class of meritorious claims connected with the transactions of the war came up and were pushed against the Government; southern claims, meritorious claims, and claims of Union men. What did Congress do? We had plenty of courts. We had the Supreme Court, and circuit courts, but Congress specially organized a court for these claims. Congress said, this is a great question, beyond the question of claims; it is a question that Congress must settle; and Congress must establish a tribunal of its own; it must make a basis of its action; and must make the rules by which it should be governed. So we established the southern commission which reports to Congress, because in all that vast subject-matter there was something more than a legal question.

The results of operation of the Alabama and other cruisers involved broad questions of statesmanship; involved the securing of a gross fund which is now in the hands of Congress, in order to give to those that suffered—to those for whom Congress intervened and set the tribunal afoot; and it should not be said that any court was established by Congress, with rules for its action, so as to keep the jurisdiction within its own power. It is for that reason, looking into the future, the Secretary of State instructed the counsel in these words:

> You will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case.

There was no intimation then and there that there were any legal rights to be decided by any court, but that the Government retained the right of deciding who should be entitled to this fund. Now, the bill provides, and very adroitly—although, as my friend from New York said the other day, it is a bill for the insurance companies and nothing else—that upon the principles of justice, equity, and the laws of nations this shall be apportioned.

Now, I do not know that if this question ever went to the courts that the insurance companies would dare to assert that they could claim it by the technical right of subrogation. But they did something; they made an assignment of their policies and followed it up by a reassignment; and it must be by something of this kind that they claim under this bill.

There is not a lawyer who does not know that the word "equity," in courts, is got to be just as well established by rules and practice as the word "law." The courts are just as much bound by rules in equity as they are in law.

I have discussed this question heretofore in another Congress, and I have no time to go over it again now, but the word itself gives no scope to the tribunal in the direction of relieving the men who suffered absolutely, the war-premium men, who struggled along, keeping their vessels under the American flag, and refused to transfer them to the British flag because of their pride in our nationality.

Now, the insurance companies have tried this thing over and over again. Beaten in one Congress, they have come to another, and it may be fairly claimed that as a precedent they wish to destroy the action of the House in 1874. That was a Congress that was fresh upon this subject, and the rule was fixed there that excluded the insurance companies, and now we are asked to go back beyond this and pass a bill clearly for their interest and for nobody else. I maintain that under the bill of the majority no other man can get a dollar, and that is why it is pushed by the insurance companies.

Mr. Speaker, you and I, during our ten years' service have seen certain things very noticeable before this House. We have seen men with honest claims, that should have been paid when first presented, drag along for years, and at last in very weariness of spirit and because Congress would not relieve them, they left us in despair or died in Washington.

There have been many instances of individuals who have just claims against the Government who died here because they were unable to get away, and because they had not the power and force of will to continue the prosecution of their claims. But there are certain large interests that never die. They clamor and knock at our doors from year to year and will never die.
